The thieves began to drop through the hole in the wall as fast as possible; but Jack was still hard at work enlarging it, for he saw that it was not near extensive enough to let the horses through, and he had no idea of leaving them behind him.

Dick, when he saw him thus occupied, helped him, and they in the course of a few minutes more got down a large portion of the wall.

"Come—come," said Maggs.

"All's right—here we are—go on, Jack."

"After you, Dick."

"D——n it, there is no time to stand upon ceremony," said Dick, as he walked his horse over the rubbish through the orifice in the wall at once. There was some little difficulty in getting over the ditch, and through the hedge, but by going backwards himself, and elbowing his way, Dick, although at the expense of some scratches, made a path for the horse.

Jack's progress was all the more easy upon that account, and they were both in the lane uninjured.

The thieves were all crouching down under the hedge, but Maggs spoke to them in a low voice.

"Disperse," he said, "if you would save yourselves. Get into the fields, so that the horsemen may be puzzled by the hedges and gates. My only wonder is, where the devil they all are."

"And mine, too," said Dick, as he placed his foot in the stirrup in the act to mount.

"Fire!" said a loud, clear voice.

In a moment a volley of fire-arms swept over the spot, and if Jack and Dick had been mounted, it would have been the next thing to an impossibility for either of them to have escaped from being hit.

The position of the thieves, under the hedge, was so far favourable that most of the bullets went over them; still some few were hit, but the remainder at once set off across the fields in such a panic, that it lent them double speed.

"Are you hit, Jack?" said Dick.

"No. Nor you?"

"All's right," said Maggs. "Be off with you, before they give us another taste of their quality."

"But you?"

"Never mind me."

"Nay—but we do, though," said Jack. "I know that Dick's Bess won't carry double, but my horse can, and will for a mile or two. Get up at once, Maggs, behind me."

"That's about it," said Maggs, as he vaulted up to the back of the horse. "Now let us be off as if the devil himself were behind us, for it is the only chance, I think."

Dick took the lead, and Jack followed him, and so along West-end Lane they went like the wind.

The moment they started, they heard a voice cry out—

"There they go. After them, my lads."

"Try it," said Jack, as he clinched his teeth, and made his steed, notwithstanding the double burthen he bore, get over the ground at a terrific pace.

The state of the road was far from being favourable, for there had been considerable rain within the last seven or eight days, so that there was much mud; but, still, that was a disadvantage that attached to the pursuers as well as to the pursued; therefore, it was not of material moment.

"On—on," Dick kept saying, and it was quite clear that, if he had liked, after the first half-mile, he could have gone far a-head of Jack and Maggs; but he generously kept by them.

The pace of Jack's horse began to slacken, and they could hear the sounds of pursuit still upon the night air.

"This won't do," said Maggs.

"Yes—yes. Hold on."

"No, I won't. I shall only involve you in destruction with me, Jack. I say, it won't do."

"Oh, yes, we shall be on a harder road in a few more minutes, for we are close to the end of the lane."

"Draw up close to the hedge, Jack, if you don't wish me to break my neck."

"How so?"

"Do it, I beg of you."

"Well, well; but every moment is a life, for all we know."

Jack drew up quite close to the hedge, and then in an instant, with amazing agility, Maggs drew up his feet, and stood upon the back of the horse.

"Good night, Jack."

With one spring he cleared the hedge, and alighted in the field on the other side of it.

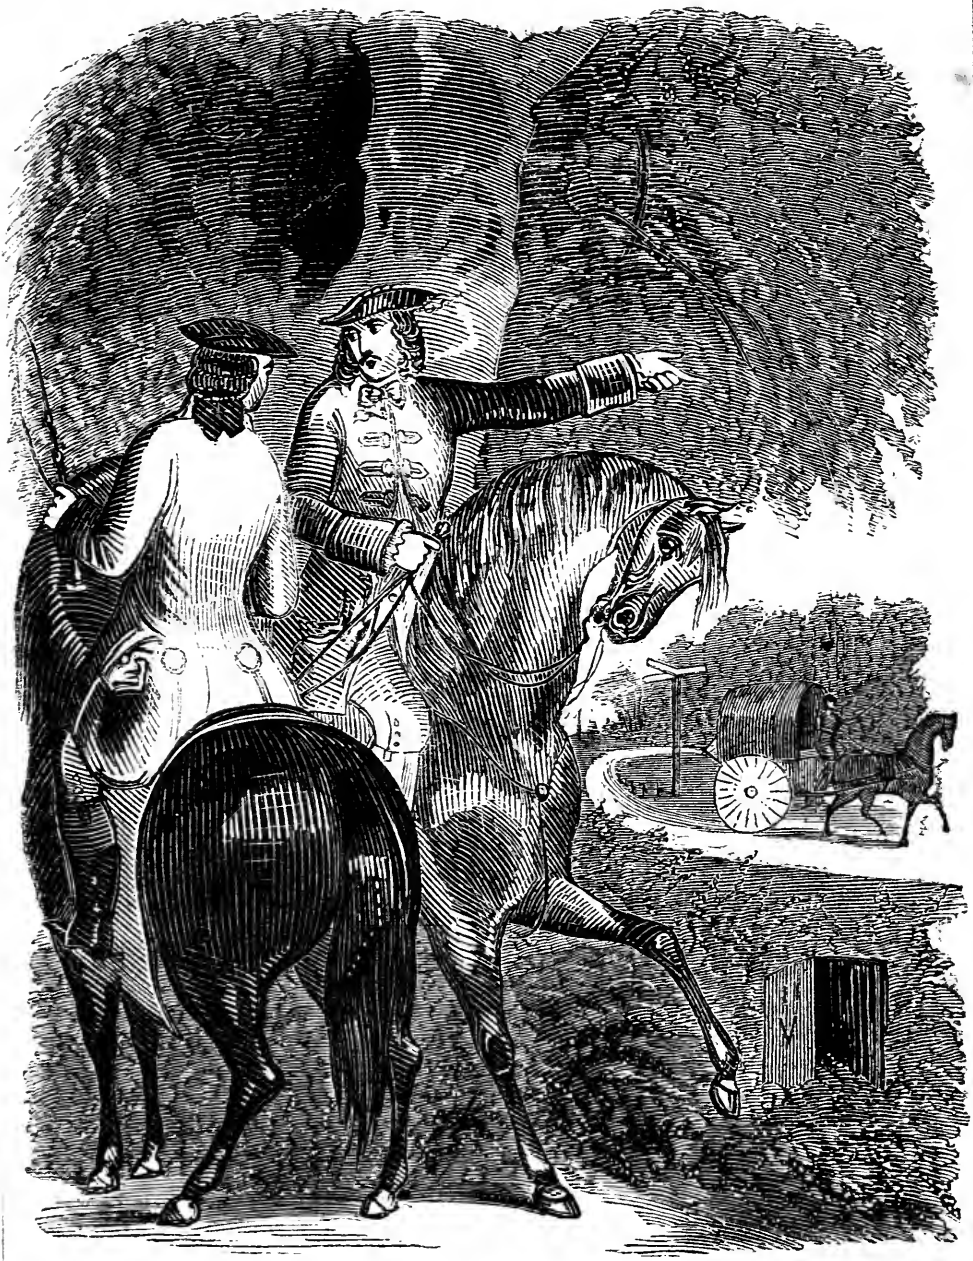
"On—on!" he cried.

"Safe?" said Jack.

"Quite. On—on!"

"Good God, Jack! where are you?" said Dick, riding back.

"Here. Push on."



The horse that Jack rode, now that he was released from the weight of Maggs upon his hind-quarters, seemed not to feel Jack at all, for he bounded on like a deer, and kept neck and neck with Turpin's beautiful mare, Bess, which was now fairly upon its mettle.

Some straggling shots now told that the officers were getting desperate and vicious with the idea that, after all, their prey was escaping them.

"Go it!" cried Dick. "Blaze away! How are you, Maggs?"

"Far enough off, and safe, I hope," said Jack.

"What, not with you?"

DICK AND JACK PLANNING THE ROBBERY OF THE BARNET NIGHT-FLY.

"Do you think this creature could carry double at such a pace as this, Dick, and so far?"

"No—no. I ought to have thought of that. But where is he?"

"I dropped him over the hedge, and the traps have passed him a good half mile now, and here we are in Kilburn. Which way is it to be?"

"Right on up Wilsden Lane."

"So be it."

Crossing diagonally the Kilburn-road, they darted up the circuitous lane that leads to Wilsden; but it was no part of Dick's policy to go there. After taking the first turn in the lane, he cried out—

"Follow me, Jack," and then spurred his horse at a low fence to the left of the road, and went over beautifully. Jack did the same, and in two minutes more they were on the other side of a hay-stack, and the horses quite quiet, and only just a little shaken by the hard pelt that they had had from West-end.

"But the traps," said Jack—"Where are they?"

"You are answered, Jack."

Jack was answered by the fact, that in the next moment the officers swept past at a gallop towards Wilsden.

"There you go," said Dick, "and the devil go with you for a parcel of blundering fools, after all. I wonder what we should see in you all to go clattering on to Wilsden with you at our heels, you parcel of curs?"

"Don't be angry, Dick."

"Oh, I am not; only—only——"

"You are a little provoked."

"Well, well, it don't matter. But that volley that they fired at us all was a cowardly thing enough."

"It was."

"Their duty was to take us, not to shoot us. It was time enough when we showed fight for them to do so."

"Never mind it, Dick. I don't think they did much mischief by it, and I am more concerned at the idea of some poor fellow lying at West-end now, wounded, than at the conduct of the officers."

"But we can't help it."

"Not a bit—not a bit. We must get to London now as soon as we can, and put up again at the old public-house. I think, after all, if we are sharp about it, we shall be as safe there as anywhere."

"No doubt about that, and, perhaps, safer. So come on. If we can hit upon a route over the fields this way we shall get into the Harrow-road, I take it, shall we, Dick?"

"Exactly. Bess is indulging herself with a few mouthfuls from the hay-stack. I don't like to baulk her for a few moments."

"All's right. My horse has just made the same discovery; so we may as well let them have a little amusement in that line at the expense of the enemy."

The horses evidently enjoyed the meal of the fresh hay very much, and they put the patience of their masters rather to the test as they kept pulling it out of the stack, and chewing away at it, notwithstanding the bit prevented free mastication.

Dick and Jack both would have been glad, if circumstances would have warranted such a course, to have released the horses from their head-gear, and let them eat at leisure; but that could not be at that present time.

"Now for it," said Dick, as he mounted; "who will lead the way? You or I, Jack?"

"You, if you think you know it, and I will do so if you have any doubt, for I know that I can lead you tolerably correctly."

"Go on, then, in the name of all that is good and lucky."

CHAPTER CCCVII.

MAGGS LETS DUVAL KNOW WHAT HIS FRIENDS ARE ABOUT.

It would appear that the officers had really made their way right to Wilsden for Dick and Jack neither saw nor heard anything further of them.

It was half past three, and a cloudy morning, as the old watchman in Smithfield had it, when the two highwaymen drew rein at the door of the public-house in Barbican. There was a man sauntering up and down by the door-post, and the moment they stopped, he stepped out on the open pavement to meet them.

"Stand, and deliver!" he said.

"Hilloa!" cried Jack. "Who are you?"

Dick laughed.

"I know who it is," he said. "Maggs, if you don't manage to disguise your voice at times better than that, I should say it requires no great amount of cunning to know you by it."

"I was not attempting to disguise it at all," said Maggs, in so very different a tone, that Dick started at the sound of it.

"I beg your pardon, Maggs," he said. "You can do the trick when you like; but in the name of all that is wonderful, how came you here before us, and without any appearance of haste, either?"

"Get your cattle put up first, before I tell you."

"Yes," said Jack, "that is only prudent."

Maggs took from his waistcoat-pocket a small bird-whistle, and blew a peculiar note upon it, and then before the echo of that note had died away, one half of the great gate of the stable was opened, and the landlord, who was just inside, put his head out, saying—

"Here you are."

"Come on, Dick," said Jack, as he rode into the stable, for he was exceedingly anxious to get the horses under cover.

Dick followed him, and Maggs trotted in after Dick. The landlord then closed the gate and put up a long wooden bar across it.

"All's right, I hope," he said.

"Yes," replied Dick, as he dismounted, "but we have had some rather sharp work of one sort and another."

"And some have suffered," said Dick.

"Ah, so Maggs has been telling me. But here you are, both of you, sound in wind and limb by all appearance, and the cattle don't seem much the worse."

"None at all, I hope," said Jack, as he took the stable-lantern from the landlord and glanced about the feet of both the beasts. "All's quite right. Rest, and a good feed, is all they want. And now, Maggs, do tell us by what conjuration you got here so soon from Wilsden Lane?"

"It's soon told, and easy," said Maggs. "You left me on a hedge in Wilsden Lane. I made a clean enough jump of it, and when I alighted on the other side I found myself in a turnip field, and the first thing I did was to hit my head against a very large specimen of that vegetable that half protruded from the ground, but as my head was considerably the hardest, I did more damage to the turnip than it could possibly do to me."

"No doubt," said the landlord.

"Well, after that I sat up a little, and while I was thinking upon things in general, past swept the officers in pursuit of you two, at a slapping pace that looked as if they really meant it."

"And they did," said Jack.

"Not a doubt of that; but as your horse no longer carried double, I had no fear of the result, as I know very well that the police cattle are seldom noted for great speed. Well, then, I thought as they had abandoned the Edgewareroad, that I might just as well go back to it myself; so I walked to Kilburn again."

"The best thing you could do," said Dick.

"So it turned out, for I got on the outside of a coach that was going to the Flower-pot in Bishopsgate-street, and I got down comfortably at the corner of the Old Bailey, and, crossing Smithfield, arrived here a quarter of an hour ago without any fatigue."

"And you were watching for us?"

"I thought it would be the best thing I could do, for you might have been otherwise delayed at such an hour."

"Many thanks," said Dick. "And now I don't know how Jack may happen to feel, but I can safely say for myself, that something to eat and something to drink would come in very welcomly to me."

"I say the same," said Jack.

"And I," said Maggs; "for I will make this place my home till the morning now."

"Come on then, all of you," said the landlord, "and you will find that the larder is anything but empty. I have had an eye—I may, indeed, go so far as to say, that I have had two eyes to the likelihood that you would come home hungry and thirsty both, so I have made arrangements accordingly; and while you eat, perhaps you can spare time, between whiles, to tell me what has been determined upon for poor Claude Duval."

"That will we," said Dick.

A cold surloin of beef was soon before the party, with every addition to it that could make it a very delightful repast, and they all enjoyed a supper, such as exercise had lent a keen zest to, with an amazing appetite. Dick briefly informed the landlord what had been resolved upon in the case of Duval, and then, at about four in the morning, he and Jack retired to rest.

Maggs took two hours' sleep, and then rising, he left the public-house without disturbing any one, and hastened to Newgate, at the wicket-gate of which he presented himself with that admirable sort of half-foolish smile which made the officers think that he was a very good-natured fellow, but by no means over bright.

In fact, the sort of attachment they had to him, no doubt, arose in a great measure from the feeling, upon their parts, that they were wonderfully sharp fellows in comparison with him; and the jokes they made at his expense always being received with the greatest good nature by him, raised him quite to a position of favouritism in the prison.

"Well, conjurer Maggs," said the man who was 'on the look,' as he opened the wicket to let him in. "How are you to-day?"

"Pretty well, thank you, Mr. Brown; and I can say that you look well, indeed; but you always does."

"Ah, I do rather flatter myself that I'm not the worst looking fellow in the world, Maggs."

"The best, Mr. Brown—the best, I should say."

"Oh, no—no. Hem! Not quite the best."

"Ah, dear, if you had only had the chances, Mr. Brown, as some fellows have, as are no more to be compared to you nor chalk is to cheese, what mightn't you a been?"

"Well—well, Maggs, never mind."

"No; but it is a pity. You ought to have been a sheriff, Mr. Brown, that you ought."

"Well, I'm much obliged to you for your good wishes, however, Maggs. I, perhaps, should have made as good a sheriff as some folks who do come here with their gold chains on, looking as prim as possible; but it ain't to be, so there's an end of it."

"Ah! more's the pity."

"But where have you been all night, Maggs? Several of the fellows have been asking for you to get them their drops of beer, and so on."

"Why, if you'd believe it, Mr. Brown, I haven't been very well; so I took some physic, and that——"

"Recovered you, and here you are."

"No—it made me worse, in course."

"Oh, indeed?"

"Yes, and here I is, not quite the thing, but yet able to do my duty, and to oblige any of my friends as will be so good as to want me to do anything for 'em."

"Well, you are a good-natured fellow, if ever there was one, that's quite clear. Can you come on duty to-night?"

"Yes, if so be as I'm wanted to."

"You will, and no mistake. There's been a precious row, I can tell you. Some fifteen of the best men on the Bow Street establishment went out last night on an expedition, and two of 'em has come off second best."

"Oh, lor! How, Mr. Brown?"

"Why, they caught nobody, and got thrown from their horses, that's a fact; and, indeed, I heard the governor say that they had one way and another made a pretty kettle of fish of it."

"Oh, dear! I is so sorry."

In this way did Maggs, by a well acted simplicity, most completely get the better of the folks at the Old Bailey, and at Newgate. It was by successfully flattering the vanity of all with whom he came into contact, from the governor down to the humblest officer of the prison, that he became so great a favourite, and that he threw really sharp, clever men off their guard.

It was about two o'clock in the day before Maggs was placed for an hour upon temporary duty inside the prison, and entrusted with the keys that opened Claude Duval's cell, as well as some others. He knew that the hour would be a long one before any of the officers thought of relieving him; so he dared not hesitate at once to seek Duval, and make him clearly understand what would be attempted to be done for him by his friends Dick and Jack, and by the thieves, upon that night which was now fast approaching.

Upon opening the door of the cell, Maggs found that Claude was sleeping; but the noise of the lock made him move uneasily, and he muttered—

"No—no, not dead. They could not kill her!"

"Poor fellow," said Maggs; "he is thinking of her whom he loved better than all the world—of Cicely."

"I tell you she lives—she lives!" murmured Claude.

Maggs stood in the doorway of the cell gazing upon the poor prisoner with compassionate eyes.

"There!" said Claude—"there they come, now, through the old churchyard, and the red-coats are with them. Oh, if you were but safe, Cicely! Will not even the sanctity of this old cathedral be respected?"

It was evident that the dreams of Duval were carrying him back to Winchester Cathedral, where Cicely had been in so much peril.

CHAPTER CCCVIII.

THE PLAN OF ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE IS CONNIVED BRAVELY.

"DUVAL!" said Maggs, as he stooped down over the pallet-bed upon which Claude lay—"Duval, I say!"

"Save her!—oh, save her!"

"Duval, awake. It is I."

Claude only dashed his arms to and fro, and muttered indistinctly the name of Cicely.

"This won't do," said Maggs, as he laid his hand upon Duval's arm. Awake, Claude Duval; but speak low."

The touch, light as it was, sufficed to arouse Duval in a moment, and he sprang to his feet, his fetters rattling as he did so, and making much more noise than Maggs thought at all prudent to be made upon that occasion.

"Silence!" he said. "Would you bring danger upon me, and destroy your own hopes of deliverance? Peace, I say!"

"Ah, who speaks to me?"

"Don't you know me?"

Duval sunk back upon the miserable couch, as he said, in a faint voice—

"Oh, yes, surely, yes, I know you now. I think, that is, I am sure that you once before said some kind things to me. I know you now. How did they let you get to this place?"

"Plague take it, Duval, you are only half awake now, I think. Rouse yourself, man."

"This is Newgate!"

"Newgate? To be sure it is. I suppose there can be very little doubt of that now. Don't you know me? I am Maggs. Come, take a drink of water, and open your eyes a little wider. How do you feel now?"

"Cooler!"

"I should think you did, for you have upset half the pitcher of water over you. But are you wide awake now?"

"Oh, yes, thank you. I have been dreaming, that's all, as a man is apt enough to do in this place, I fancy. Well, Maggs, what have you in the shape of news for me?"

"Listen to me attentively Duval to what I am going to say to you, for I don't know how long they may leave me to say it in, and it is important that you should know all about it; you can ask me any questions afterwards."

"Go on—go on."

Maggs then rapidly detailed to him all that had taken place at the meeting at West-end, and of the determination that Dick Turpin and Sixteen-string Jack had made to attempt his rescue upon that very night that was now coming; and he concluded his communication by saying—

"Now, Duval, of course everything will depend upon your absolute coolness and discretion at the time I hope that we may depend upon you in those particulars."

"My dear fellow, ask Dick and Jack if ever I was wanting in such qualities when they are requisite."

"That will do quite well. I have no need to ask them, because I am quite sure myself that you will be all right. And now take this key."

"A key?"

"Yes; and to you it is the most important one that ever you had in your hand. It unlocks the fetters that you have on. They might have put you on a rivetted set, and if they had, you would have had to leave Newgate with them."

"They are rivetted."

"You don't mean that?"

"Yes, I do. About three or four hours ago, I think it was, they came in with the prison blacksmith and the governor's clerk, and took off the fetters I had on, and rivetted these in their place. I don't know what motive they had for so doing, as I never once opened my lips to them, or they to me."

"I don't at all understand it," said Maggs, as he paced the cell several times with rather a distracted mien. "I can't make out what they mean by it. You gave them money, Claude?"

"They have had twenty pounds of me."

"Then you are entitled to every indulgence; but I suppose it was some whim of the governor's. I cannot account for it in any other way; and the truth of it is, that I am quite unprovided with the tools to enable you to get rid of the fetters you now wear."

"It is awkward enough."

"Never mind, they will carry you out with them, even if the worst comes to the worst; but if I can bring you in a file or two between this time and two o'clock, I will."

"Thank you, Maggs. I only feel half a man while this cold iron is about my limbs,"

"I don't wonder at it. But it is now quite understood that you will be prepared for action?"

"Oh, yes. And Cicely, she is better, no doubt?"

Maggs was confused, but Claude said immediately, in a higher and more excited voice—

"It is in vain for you to try to deceive me. I know that she has been badly wounded, and I have reason to believe that she is lying very ill somewhere; but if I thought she were dead, I tell you, Maggs, notwithstanding all your good feeling towards me, and notwithstanding all my wishes to hold my dear friend Jack by the hand again, I would not leave this cell alive."

"Nay, now, Claude——"

"Do not try to contend this affair with me. It is my fixed resolution. But I know she is not dead. I shall meet her again, I feel quite assured of it."

"Not a doubt of it. In another world, perhaps," added Maggs, to himself, "but not in this."

"Well—well, that is settled," added Duval. "I will be ready, and you can accept for yourself better thanks than words can give you, and tell all my friends that I have no means of letting them know how much I appreciate their generous kindness and devotion to me."

"I will—I will."

"Do so; and yet—yet——"

"Yet what, Duval?"

"If I thought that it was at all likely they would fall in this attempt to rescue me, I would rather die a thousand deaths than permit them to engage in such an enterprise."

"They know all that as well as you can tell it to them," replied Maggs, "and I don't think that any hesitation upon your part would have the effect of stopping them in their attempt to do something for you. They have pledged themselves to it; and upon the aid which you personally give to them will depend, I assure you, in a great measure, the success or the failure of the plan."

"Say no more. I will do all that man can do."

"That is right. If I can get out of the prison and procure you a good file or two, by the aid of which you may manage to rid yourself of your fetters, well and good; but if I cannot do that, Duval, you must not despair."

"Indeed, I will not."

Maggs now felt that he had had quite a long enough conference with Claude, considering the circumstances; and feeling that if the least suspicion should be awakened, the whole plan might fail, he left the cell, and kept watch and ward in the narrow gloomy passage adjoining it which was his proper place, considering that he was playing the part of turnkey on very special duty.

It was as well that Maggs had left the cell of Duval so quickly as he did, for he had not been five minutes out of it when he met the governor of Newgate and one of the sheriffs of London, evidently proceeding to the cell.

"Hilloa!" said the governor. "Who is on duty there?"

"I you please, sir," said Maggs, assuming the simple air and manner by which he was so well known in Newgate. "If you please, sir, I am."

"Oh, Maggs?"

"Yes, noble sir; I is Maggs, if you please."

"All's right," said the governor. "I believe, Maggs, although you are not so overburthened with cunning as some folks that I could name, you are more to be depended upon. You are a faithful fellow."

"Oh, sir, I hopes as how I is."

The sheriff wanted to be very condescending to Maggs, so, nodding his little round, sleek head, he said—

"Go on, my good Maggs—go on in doing your duty to those placed above you. Always look up with proper reverence to your superiors, Maggs, and you will do right you know. Be humble, Maggs, that's the way for common people to get on."

Common people! Oh, dear! That sheriff was a cheesemonger.

"Thank you kindly, gentlemen," said Maggs; "it makes the tears come into the eyes of a poor fellow to be spoke to by such great gentlemen as you."

"A very civil man," said the sheriff, as he walked on.

"Oh, very," said the governor.

"And knows his place."

"That's what I like him for. He never presumes, you see, sir, and as you say, he knows his place. That is a great quality in a poor person, you know, sir."

"Oh, very great. Oh, dear me, I had a clerk to keep my books—they say he was the son of a decayed gentleman, or something of that sort; but, would you believe it, Mr. Governor, I only called him a vagabond in a quiet sort of way, because he didn't make out a bill I wanted, and what do you think he did?"

"Apologised."

"No—no! Guess again."

"Cried, and begged pardon."

"No. He actually pulled my nose!"

"You don't mean it?"

"Yes, he did, and then taking his hat, out he walked, after giving me a kick behind that sent me nearly under the fire-grate, and from that day to this he has never been near my counting-house again, I assure you, or else I would have given him into custody, of course."

"Well, sir, that is truly shocking—ungrateful, too. But here we are, sir, at Claude Duval's cell, and I have my master-key with me, which will open it."

"Ah," said the sheriff, as the key rattled in the lock of the cell-door, "we will now inform him that he will be tried on Friday, and it is now Wednesday, so he will be comfortably enough hanged out of hand on Monday next."

"Walk in, Mr. Sheriff," said the governor, as he flung the cell-door wide open. "Walk in, sir; you will find the prisoner here, sir."

CHAPTER CCCIX.

DETAILS WHAT TOOK PLACE BETWEEN TWO AND FOUR IN THE MORNING AT NEWGATE.

Claude Duval was officially informed by the sheriff that his trial upon various charges of highway robbery would take place on the Friday ensuing, to which communication he merely inclined his head in token that he heard it.

"And," said the sheriff, "of course this is told you in order that you may avail yourself of the interval to procure legal advice, if you please so to do."

"Thank you. I will manage without," said Duval.

"Very good."

The sheriff waddled out of the cell, but the governor lingered for a moment, and said—

JACK AND TURPIN WATCHING THE APPROACH OF LAWYER CROKE'S CARRIAGE.

"Allow me to recommend you a very clever solicitor, Duval. You may as well, you know, spend what cash you have still left in that way as in any other."

"Thank you, I'd rather not."

"Oh, very good."

The governor slammed the door of the cell shut with a vehemence that showed he was not at all pleased at the determination of Claude Duval not to employ a solicitor, for the one he wanted to recommend was his son-in-law, a needy rascal, who had married his daughter merely for the purpose of getting a living by the union.

Maggs had kept his post in the passage adjoining to poor Duval's cell for more than an hour, when he was relieved by one of the regular turnkeys of the prison, who nodded to him with a jocose familiarity, as he said—

"All right, old fellow?"

"Oh dear, yes, Mr. Wilkins. All's right, sir."

"That will do. You are a good fellow, Maggs. Get yourself a pint of beer. Here is the money."

"How kind of you, Mr. W."

"Oh, no, not at all; you shall never want a pint of beer while I have the money to spare for it; so now you can go as soon as you like, and we shan't want you till night again."

"Very good, sir."

Maggs wished very much indeed to get out of Newgate, for he had much to do, but he did not let the officers of the prison see that he had any anxiety of that kind, and, indeed, he stopped in the lobby and gossiped for about five minutes, and then he fetched a pot of beer for the gentleman who was on the lock; but at last he was free, and he strolled up the Old Bailey at a slow pace, till he reached Newgate Street, and then he quickened his pace and went so fast that he was in Aldersgate Street in a few minutes.

Crossing to the other side of the way, then, Maggs dived down one of the small turnings which were upon the site of the present post-office, and he did not pause till he reached a tall, miserable-looking house, the lower part of which seemed to be completely boarded up.

At this house Maggs applied for admittance, by ringing a bell that was attainable by rather a narrow examination of the begrimed door post.

In the course of a few minutes the door was opened a little way, but a chain was up, so that it was quite safe.

"Who is there?" asked a female voice.

"Maggs," was the reply. "Is Dickson at home?"

"Oh, yes, he is. Come in."

The lady, for such we may in very great courtesy call her, took down the chain, and admitted Maggs to the passage of the house.

"Come arter me," she said. "He's up stairs."

Maggs followed the interesting female—who was attired in a flannel dressing-gown, that certainly did not look as if it had been made acquainted with soap and water for some years—up the old dilapidated staircase, and into a room where a man, who was about as cleanly as the lady in his attire, was eating very fat bacon, and drinking raw spirits to aid in its digestion.

"Hilloa, old boy," cried the man, "how are you?"

"Pretty well, and you?"

"Charming. I am rather weak, though, in the stomach, so, you see, I am delicate as to what I take."

"Humph! Under-done fat bacon, and raw brandy. Do you think they are light, pleasant, nutritious things?"

"Eh?"

Maggs smiled. Mr. Dickson did not quite understand him when he spoke of nutritious substances; but he knew the real object of his visit would be easier comprehended. So, taking a pocket-book from his pocket, he opened it at a place where a leaf was turned down, and handing it to the man, he said—

"What do you suppose all that will come to?"

"I'll tell you in a minute, Maggs. Let me see: six horses—one coach, private, with all complete—two suits of livery. Ah, well, it depends on whether you buy 'em or hire 'em."

"The latter, if it can be done."

"That depends on the service, you see; and yet, I don't know, if the value is forthcoming."

"It can be deposited, if that is any object," said Maggs, "so if any danger or damage should come to the traps, whoever lends them will be on the right side of the hedge, after all, you see."

"Good. Then as far as I think, mind you, Maggs—but I can't say on the moment to within twenty pounds, or so—but as far as I think, mind you, on the moment, I should say four hundred pounds."

"Very good."

Dickson looked at Maggs for a moment or two in silence, and then he said, in a tone of more interest than he had before shown in the transaction—

"Will that do?"

"Yes, if you will undertake it."

Dickson rose at once, and took off the dressing-gown in which he was enveloped, and which, like the flannel garment of the lady, certainly had collected the dust and the grease of many a long year.

"How about time?" he said.

"All must be ready by midnight here."

"That will do."

Maggs dived his hand into a secret pocket in the lining of his coat, and got out a small and very flat tin box, from which he extracted four one-hundred notes, and, handing them to Dickson, he said—

"There is the deposit; and now I know, old friend, that I may thoroughly and entirely depend upon you in this affair. It is one that I have set my heart upon, although it is not one that I feel disposed to say any more about just now, even to you."

"Did I ask any questions?"

"No—no—you never do."

"Very good."

"But still, if this affair was only a secret of my own, I should ask you to be so good as to listen to it; but it belongs to others, and so I let it remain as it is."

"All's right, old fellow. At twelve o'clock you will find under the archway close at hand here, all the traps that you have asked for; and let you be going upon what lay you may, I wish you all the luck in the world, and a little more to the back of that."

"Thanks. I am authorised to say that if everybody comes back here again safe, it is a hundred pound job to you, Dickson."

"Very well, that's agreed then. Poll—Poll, I say!"

"What now?" said the woman, appearing at the door of the room.

"My togs—quick, and tell Jarvis I want the brown cob saddled and at the door in a crack. Good morning, Maggs. It's all as right as it can be, and that's all I can say."

"I know it. Good morning."

Maggs left the place and hastened to the public-house, but as he passed through Aldersgate Street he bought half a dozen very fine small files that would cut anything, and then he proceeded to inform Dick and Jack of what progress he had made in the affair of Claude Duval's rescue, and in what manner Claude himself had received the project.

The two friends were anxiously enough expecting his appearance, and they were well satisfied with the explanation that he had ready for them, and with the arrangements he had made.

"Now mind you," said Maggs, "we must all of us perfectly comprehend what we have to do. There must be nothing left to chance. I will be here at a quarter to twelve to-night, and those six of the family that are to go with us will be here at that hour likewise. We shall want two people, or I should say three, to hold our horses at the corner of Newgate Street, though."

"I can furnish you with those," said the landlord, "and, indeed, as I shall be very anxious to know how the affair comes off, I will make one of the three myself. Then there is my boy, Sam, he will come, and I will manage to get some one else that can be depended upon, so that you may consider it to be all settled."

"It is off my mind, then," said Maggs; "and now all you have to do, Dick and Jack, is to be as particular as possible in your disguises, and take care how you play your parts."

"The letter, too, from the Secretary of State, must be well got up," said Jack. "Who will do it?"

"I," said Maggs. "I have seen such documents come to the old prison, and I know the style and look of them quite well, and if our host here will send out for a sheet of blue foolscap paper and some red wax, I will show you how a despatch from the Home Office, as far as the outside goes, may be manufactured in a few minutes."

The materials mentioned by Maggs were soon provided for him, and he manufactured a long, official-looking enclosure, with a great coat of arms upon the seal, which he had procured from an old lapidary's shop in Long-lane, Smithfield.

"Now," he said, "I don't mean to say that this would deceive the governor, or any very official eye, but it will do very well indeed for a turnkey of Newgate."

"Especially at two o'clock in the morning," said Jack.

"Just so."

Everything was now duly arranged, and Maggs spent about an hour with Jack and Dick talking over all the little chances of the plan, and all its probabilites and possibilities, one way or the other, so that they left nothing to be considered at a late hour, when action of the most prompt and decisive character would be everything.

"We shall do it," said Dick. "I do believe we shall do it; and if so, it will be about the most daring thing that has been done yet in connexion with Newgate."

CHAPTER CCCX.

THE ESCAPE OF DUVAL PROMISES WELL, AND THINGS TURN OUT FORTUNATELY.

NOTWITHSTANDING all his confidence in the arrangements that had been made for the escape of Duval from Newgate, Maggs could not help trembling a little for the result, when he knew that it depended so completely and entirely upon the accidental circumstance of his being required to take the place of one of the turnkeys of Newgate.

That some alteration might take place in that arrangement, and so destroy the whole plan, he well knew; and, however his experience of the internal economy of the prison told him that nothing was more improbable than that such an alteration of intention should ensue, yet its possibility was a scource of great anxiety.

Maggs had not thought proper to make any mention to Dick or to Jack of the doubt that was upon his mind.

"I shall only dispirit them if I do," he thought to himself, "and the best thing I can possibly do to ensure them success is, to let them come full of confidence that they will have it. Nothing will be easier than for me to meet them, even at the last moment, in the Old Bailey and let them know that the attempt must be put off until another night, if such a thing should turn out to be absolutely necessary."

That it should not be necessary, however, was the fervent hope and wish of Maggs, for he knew how much of the spirit of enterprise was lost when such an affair as that which was in progress was not duly carried out at the time, and in the manner it had been projected.

At all events, Maggs left Dick and Jack full of hope, after duly arranging everything for the evening, as he, of course, would be in the prison, and unable to take an active part in bringing them to the spot for action at the requisite hour.

It was after ten at night that—tolerably fatigued by all the bustle and the excitement of the day, and with his mind intensely occupied by the many speculations that the coming events of the night gave rise to—Maggs arrived at the wicket gate of Newgate.

"Hilloa, old boy!" said the man on the "lock," "is that you?"

"Yes, sir, it's me—poor Maggs."

"Ah, well—come in. The governor has been asking for you."

"Has he, indeed?"

"Why, you don't suppose I should say so if he hadn't?"

"Oh, dear—no. But what can such a great man as the governor want to say to a poor fellow like me, I wonder?"

"Well, I don't know. The sheriff has been with him, and after a long talk they sent here to the lobby to know if you were here."

Maggs felt his heart beat quickly as he heard this, for he dreaded, after all, that some suspicion of the design he had on hand might have crept out. If it had, all was lost. Notwithstanding his agitation and his anxiety, though, he felt the vast importance of appearing quite calm and collected to the turnkey, and he said—

"Well, here I am if they want me now, you know."

"To be sure, it was some time ago, and I don't know whether to send to let them know you are here or not."

"Is the worshipful and honourable sheriff, then, still here?" said Maggs,

"Oh, yes; didn't you see his coach at the corner by Ludgate?"

"No; I came the other way, and so I missed that great pleasure, for I likes to see a sheriff's coach, and I likes to see the fine footman; and I often thinks to myself—Oh, dear, why didn't fortune make me a sheriff's footman?"

"Why, what a simpleton you are, Maggs."

"Well, I'm that, I know; but only think, Mr. Jones, what calves they have got. Only think of that—Oh, dear me!"

"Why, you goose, you don't suppose that being a sheriff's footman gives a man great calves to his legs, do you?"

"Yes, it does," said a turnkey, who had been sitting on the bench at the far end of the lobby. "Maggs is right. It does do so. They are cork, you see. My dear fellow, Maggs—bless your innocence, they are nothing but cork."

"Cork, sir? What! a cork out of a bottle?"

"Ha! Ha!" laughed the turnkey. "Well, you are a goose, to be sure, Maggs, and the great good of you is, that you are a faithful and a good-tempered one. But I do think, Jones, that now he has come, it would be better to let the governor know, as he was asked for."

"Well, perhaps it will. I'm on the lock, and can't go. Suppose you go, and say, that Maggs is here? or stay—why shouldn't he go himself? He knows the way. Be off with you, Maggs, and report yourself to the governor, old boy; you know his room door, don't you?"

"Oh, yes; but you really arn't now ajoking with me?"

"No—no, upon my soul, I am not. I wouldn't do it, Maggs; and, besides, it would be as much as my place is worth to play off any jokes when the governor and the sheriff are concerned; so you may go in perfect safety, old fellow."

"Thank you. I will."

Maggs was as anxious as he could possibly be to know what the governor and the sheriff could want to say to him; and although he kept up his rather silly look, which he knew so well how to assume, and although he dawdled along the passages towards the governor's room, if he had consulted the feeling of impatience that really beset him, he would have flown at his utmost speed.

Maggs, however, had set himself a part to perform, and he was not going to spoil it by any foolish precipitancy; so he reached the door of the governor's rooms as calmly and as quietly, to all outward show, as it was possible for any man to be, and tapped very humbly and gently on the panel.

"Come in," cried the governor.

Maggs just ventured to put his head inside the door, and said, in his usual weak voice—that voice which he always spoke in when within the walls of old Newgate, and which all the officials of the prison knew so well—

"Did your worshipful honours want to see me? It was Mr. James as is on the lock as said as your worshipful honours wanted to see me; so here I is."

"Oh, yes, Maggs. Come in."

"Thank you, sir."

"Shut the door, Maggs," said the sheriff. "We want to speak to you, my man, and we think you may really do some good; and if you do, of course, we will not forget you, you may depend."

"Oh, worshipful sir, the idea of being thought of for a moment by such a great person as a sheriff and a governor is enough all for to take away a poor fellow's breath, that it is—Oh, dear!"

"Well, well, Maggs, you are a good, honest sort of man. Take a seat, Maggs—you are agitated."

"A little, worshipful sirs. It is such an honour."

"Well, sit down."

"Oh, dear no. I wouldn't—I wouldn't, indeed. What! sit down afore a sheriff and a governor? Oh, no—don't ask me to do it, gentlemen. Only think if I should get proud in consequence, and lose my wits. I ain't over bright, they say, at the best; but I might be worser."

The sheriff laughed; so did the governor. How gratified they both were at the great superiority, as they considered of their intellects, over the poor humble Maggs, whom they thought looked upon them as the two greatest men in all the world!

"Well, Maggs," said the governor, "since you object to sit down, you can do as you like; but mind you attend to what the sheriff is about now to say to you, for it is very important."

"Oh, dear, yes, sir, I will—I will."

"Maggs," said the sheriff, "you are a poor simple sort of fellow, you know, and nobody minds much what you say or what you do, so upon those grounds you really can be more useful than a brighter sort of man."

"Yes, noble sir."

"Don't interrupt me, but just listen to me patiently, and try to fully comprehend what I say to you. If I use any words you don't understand, you can ask me the meaning of them."

"Thank you, worshipful sir."

How kind it was of the sheriff to speak so to a man who, both in intellect and education, was vastly his superior! But he did not know it, so we must hold him excused.

"It is possible enough, Maggs, that you may be able to accomplish what clever men would fail in, and, therefore, the governor and I have hit upon you to carry out a little plan that we have connected with Claude Duval."

Maggs never changed colour in the least as this name was pronounced by the sheriff, although the fact that it was so pronounced had excited his liveliest fears that by some means the adventure that he had so fully intended should come off that night with success, would miscarry.

"Yes," added the sheriff, "we really think that your simplicity—your appearance of utter want of design—your poverty—all may be found serviceable to the ends of the law."

"The law, sir? Oh, dear, I don't know nothing about the law."

"But you will."

"Oh, I hope not, worshipful sirs. I assure you I never was took up by the law in all my life."

They both smiled.

"Nor will you ever, so long as you do your duty to us as a good and faithful servant. And now for what you are to do, and which, notwithstanding your good sense and modesty in denying all notion of extra reward, you shall be munificently paid for doing."

"Yes," put in the governor; "you shall be most munificently paid. Did you ever, now, in all your life possess five guineas?"

"Five guineas, sir?"

"Yes. No doubt to you, who are a poor fellow, it seems to be a very large sum; but never mind that: you shall have as much for yourself if you succeed in carrying out the little project we are about to set you upon the execution of."

"Five guineas?—It's quite a fabulous sum of money, gentlemen."

The sheriff laughed at him, and rattled the money that was in his pocket, as a well-to-do, fat, easy-pursy, swindling citizen of London may well do, and then he said—

"In plain language, then, Maggs, what we want you to do is to go to the cell of Claude Duval, and pretend to have great sympathy with him, and tell him how sorry you are that he is taken up, and that you hear he will be hanged, and all that sort of thing."

"I will, sir," said Maggs, much relieved that the duty he was set upon would not take him out of the prison.

"Then you must ask him if there's anything you can possibly do for him; and if he don't mention it himself, you can hint that it would give you great pleasure to take any message for him to any friend; do you understand?"

"Oh, yes, noble sir."

"Well, then, from all this, what we wish is, that you should get from him where Dick Turpin and Sixteen-string Jack, the two notorious highwaymen with whom he used to go about, and be the terror of the road, are to be found. You understand me now?"

"Yes, your worshipful worship, I do. I am to find out, by pretending to be his friend, enough to enable me to be his worst foe?"

"Why, a—yes—well, that's it."

"I am to pretend to sympathise with a man in prison, while I play the spy all the while, and worm his secrets out of him through the medium of his best feelings?"

"What do you mean, sir?"

"He! he!" laughed Maggs with a silly kind of laugh that he could put on capitally at pleasure. "He! he! I'll do it wonderful. Oh, won't I do it for five golden guineas. I do think, do you know, gentlemen, that he will take me for such a fool, that he will tell me everything"

"Very likely."

"Yes," added the governor; "these fellows, when they get into prison, would give anything in the world for somebody to talk to."

"And I ain't half such a fool as I look," said Maggs.

"I don't think you are," said the sheriff, "to tell the truth."

"I'm sure he isn't," said the governor; "at all events, he is quite wise enough to be able to do what we wish upon the present occasion; are you not, Maggs?"

"I believe you, sir, I am."

"Very good; now go at once, and you will have every facility for seeing the prisoner; and we beg that you will lose no time in speaking to him upon the subject, for if we could only find out where Turpin and Jack are to be found, we would pounce upon them, and it should go hard but what we would hang the whole three of them on the same morning, which would be a capital piece of work."

"Capital it would," said Maggs. "Good night, worshipful sirs. I'll do my very best to-night, you may depend."

CHAPTER CCCXI.

THE SHERIFF FINDS THAT MAGGS IS TRULY ANYTHING BUT SUCH A FOOL AS HE LOOKS.

Maggs, to tell the truth, was rather delighted at his interview with the sheriff and the governor. If any weak hold upon his sense of honour as being employed by them had retained itself faintly upon the heart of Maggs, it was now dissipated.

They had passed upon him, certainly, the most grievous insult that they possibly could—that is to say, they had thought him to be capable of committing a very base act of treachery; and after that they could hardly feel either surprised or angry at the fact of his betraying them as he was about to do.

But yet Maggs felt that his vocation or mission, call it which you will, was at Newgate. He felt that there he was inestimably useful to the fraternity of thieves, and that it was only by staying there that he could continue to be very useful.

Hence, then, was it that Maggs hoped, notwithstanding all that might happen that night, to escape any blame on its account; but if he should really find it to be impossible to carry on the affair without compromising himself, he was quite prepared to do so.

At the same time that he would, if he could, retain his old standing at Newgate, he told himself that if upon any occasion it was to be sacrificed, there could not be a better nor a more important one than that which was about to ensue.

"I will succeed," said Maggs, "at all risks. I will save Duval, or I will be thoroughly convinced that it is quite impossible at any sacrifice, or through any danger to do so."

When a man makes such a resolve as that, he is very likely indeed to succeed in what he undertakes, and hence Maggs had the best of hopes. When he reached the lobby again the turnkeys rather eagerly questioned him as to what the governor and the sheriff wanted with him, but Maggs was not going to tell them.

"Oh, you'd hardly believe it," he said, "that they wanted to give me a regular situation in the prison."

"I'll be hanged," said Jones, "if I didn't think so, and then one of us will be packed off, as sure as a gun."

"No, you won't," said Maggs, "for I wouldn't have it."

"You wouldn't?"

"Sartainly not."

"You don't mean that now, really, Maggs?"

"Oh, yes, they offered to make me what they call a super—super—a something beginning with super."

"Supernumerary, I suppose?"

"Yes, that was it, a supernumerary turnkey, and to give me a matter of thirty-five shillings a week; but I said, 'No—give me what you pleases, and let me go out and in as I like, and when I like, and make myself as useless as I can.'"

"As useful, you mean."

"To be sure I does; so there's the end of it. Why, who would get you your drops of beer and your bits of tobacco, and go a hundred little messages for you all, of one sort or another, if I had any regular duty to do?"

"That's it, Maggs, that's it."

"To be sure it is; so I declined it, and there's a end of it. I won't be a regular turnkey, but I like to go about the old stone-jug, and be as useless——"

"Useful, my boy."

"Yes—useful as possible to you all; so here I am, just as usual. Lord bless you, Mr. Jones, if they had offered to make me the lord mayor, I wouldn't have had it, that I wouldn't."

"You are a trump, Maggs."

TURPIN LISTENS FOR HIS PURSUERS AFTER ROBBING THE NIGHT-FLY.

"He is a trump," said the two officers, whose duty it was to be on guard in the lobby. "He is a trump, and no sort of mistake in this here world. Give us your fist, old fellow. That's right. We respect you, Maggs."

"And I suspect all of you."

"Respect, you mean."

"To be sure I do. Oh, dear, what a poor head I have got, to be sure!"

The turnkeys were quite delighted with this conduct upon the part of Maggs, and never had he been in such high favour with them all as he was upon that special occasion. It was now not far from eleven o'clock, and at twelve he was to go on duty, to give the officers who ought to have remained till two time to go home.

We have before said that this substitution of Maggs for the regular officers at any time was winked at by the governor, as Maggs was considered quite competent and trustworthy; and in so easy a way it was thought no evil to let the regular officers of the prison have a little relaxtion at odd times and seasons, when their absence was of no moment.

And now Maggs took care to show no uneasiness or haste to get to Claude Duval's cell; but he let the hour slip away as quietly as possible; and when it was twelve, and the officer who was going home gave him a tap on the back, and said, "Now, Maggs, my boy, keep a good watch," he merely replied—

"Won't I, that's all."

"I know you will. Good night. I shall be back about three, I hope, and, perhaps, before it. Good night."

"Good night," said Maggs; "and mind, Mr. Brown, you needn't at all hurry yourself, for I shan't miss you, you may depend upon it."

"All's right—all's right."

The officer was gone, and Maggs fastened the huge bunch of keys that had been left to him to his waist, as he said—

"Well, I'll have a look at Claude Duval, and see whether he is all safe, afore I sits down in Brown's chair."

"Do so, Maggs," said Jones. "It's only proper you should. Brown ought to have done so before he went."

"Oh, he knew I would, at leastways he guessed as much, no doubt," said Maggs, as he took a lamp, and went along the long, narrow, gloomy passage that led to Claude Duval's cell.

If the sheriff and the governor had only seen the remarkable change that came over the face of Maggs as he neared the cell in which was the prisoner in whom both he and they, only in different ways, felt so deeply interested, they would hardly have believed the evidence of their own eyes.

Once he turned and listened. He could faintly hear the murmured tones of the turnkeys in the lobby conversing.

"They have no suspicion," he said. "All is well."

Then, when he reached the door of Duval's cell, he paused again, and listened attentively—all was profoundly still, for he was then out of ear-shot of the turnkeys in the lobby.

"All is well," he said again.

Maggs took these precautions, notwithstanding by the request of the sheriff, and with the knowledge of the turnkeys, he was seeking the cell of the prisoner, but he felt that he could not be too cautious, and that everything would depend upon his own and Claude Duval's presence of mind.

Maggs unlocked the cell door, and left the key in the lock. It grated harshly upon it hinges as he opened it.

"Who's there?" cried Duval.

"Hush! It is I."

"You are most welcome, Maggs. I——"

"Speak low. Your tones are very sad, Duval; what has happened to you now? You are not ill, I hope?"

"Oh, no, Maggs; but, to tell the truth, I have been foolish enough to allow my nerves to be a little shaken by a dream."

"Oh, you will soon shake that feeling off."

"Yes, I hope so. But I thought that in this cell I saw a coffin with the dead body of a female in it, and that a figure of death, armed with a spear, suddenly appeared, and said—

"'Look! Claude Duval—look!—yes, look at the face of her whom you loved, before the worms so deface her beauty, that even to you she would be a loathsome spectacle.' It was at that moment, Maggs, that I heard the rattle of your key in the lock of the door."

"I am glad I came to put to flight such uncomfortable visions, Claude; you should laugh at them."

"Alas! I cannot."

"Well—well, perhaps not; but you will soon forget them. I bring you the best and most cheering news."

"Ah, indeed?"

"Yes. Speak low, and listen to me. By-the-bv, I will keep the door of the cell open, and stand close to it, and then it will be impossible for any one to come down the passages without me knowing it. I do not think, mind you, Duval, that there is the slightest breath of suspicion abroad, but it is as well to be on the safe side."

"You are right, Maggs. Oh, how much I owe you!"

"Nothing—nothing."

"Yes, but I do, though, Maggs, and I will take good care if I do, through your means, obtain my freedom, that I will make the attempt to show you that I can be grateful."

"You will oblige me by saying no more on that head. At all events, wait till we can shake hands on Ealing Common, or Hounslow Heath."

"Ah, that will be glorious."

"Well, I hope that that time will come to-morrow, for at two o'clock—the two o'clock that is now fast coming—your friends will be here to try to drag you from Newgate."

"Will they, indeed, persevere in such a bold and admirable plan?"

"They will. But you shake! you are agitated."

If we were to say that Claude Duval at this time felt quite cool and collected, we should be giving currency to an idea that could not be in any way sanctioned by the fact, which was, that he was much more agitated than he had ever known himself to be upon any occasion of his eventful career.

He was himself both annoyed and surprised to find that such was the fact.

We can probably account for it better than Claude Duval could himself.

The fact was, that the want of air and exercise, to which he had been so accustomed, that they were more essential in their abundance to his health than to those of most persons, had had the effect of very much depressing him.

This was the precise reason why Claude Duval did not feel in his usual condition.

"Oh, Maggs," he said, "how can I be otherwise than agitated at the idea that I shall soon, perhaps—nay, I will not entertain any doubt, so I will say for certain, breathe the fresh air of liberty, and be able to rush to the arms of Cicely?"

"Oh, yes—yes."

"Maggs!"

"Well, Duval?"

"You will now, like a man and a dear friend to me, as you are, tell me how she is. Is she suffering from a wound? In a word, is she well, Maggs? Come, tell me now, distinctly."

"She is suffering from no wound, Claude—she is well."

"Thank Heaven, then, all is well, and I ask no more."

"It is well. Dick and Jack can tell you every particular that you may wish to know, and I refer you to them. But how do you get on about your fetters?"

"Oh, bravely. They are in such a state, Maggs, that I feel I have but to make an effort, which even my weakened powers are equal to, and I can cast them from me. Do I look very pale?"

"Oh, no. But the air of Newgate soon robs a man of his colour. It would pale the cheek of a ploughboy in a week. There is something dead and pestiferous in it. Oh, that two o'clock were come, Claude."

"I echo that sentiment, Maggs."

How long that two hours seemed from twelve till two!

A thousand times over did Claude Duval think that the hour must have passed, and that, although listening for it most intently, it had, in its sound from the old church clock of St. Sepulchre's, escaped his ears, and he said as much to Maggs.

At length, faintly came the sound of the chimes from that clock, the sound of which had heralded so many a poor shrinking soul into eternity.

As the cell of Duval was situated, it was just possible by close attention to hear the hours struck by that clock, and now, at the sound, Duval sprang to his feet.

"It is time, Maggs!" he said—"it is time."

"Hush! Now, of all times, then, let me pray you to be still and calm. Claude Duval, upon that depends all else."

"I will—I will!"

"Leave all to me, and to your friends."

"But, Maggs, you will give me a weapon—you will not, if all should go wrong, suffer me to be dragged back to this cell again without a struggle? I must and will have arms."

"You terrify me by your vehemence."

"Oh, no—no! But you hear me—you understand me? You, if you were situated as I am, would do as I do—you would feel as I feel, and you would say as I say. Arms—I want arms!"

"Hush! There are a pair of pistols, the fellows of which you would find it difficult to match in London."

"Loaded?"

"Yes, carefully. But now, knowing, Claude Duval, that you have the lives of two men in your hands, let me implore you to do nothing rash. All noise must be avoided. One ill-directed shot would bring upon us the whole force of the prison."

"I know it—I know it. I will justify all that you might expect of me, Maggs. But the time has come, and I hear nothing. Ah! the sound of carriage wheels outside—they pause at the door of Newgate. They come, they come, Maggs."

"Hush!—hush!"

"Ah! there is a voise from the lobby. Listen—listen. I hear it now."

Yes, there was a sound from the lobby of the prison, and the heart of Claude Duval beat fast and thick.

Another sound—he knew not whether it was strife or merely commotion; but he felt that it was time for Maggs to go.

Maggs felt this, too.

"I go," he said—"I go. Now, Duval, keep by the door of your cell, and when you hear a whistle, it will be from me, and it will be then time for you to come into the lobby. Mind, I will let you pass me, and you will meet Dick and Jack."

"Yes—oh, yes!"

"Now, be calm, and good-by for a few moments only, I hope and expect."

Claude Duval was alone. Oh, how terrible was the suspense of the few moments only that ensued, for they were but moments, after all. To his perception, all his imprisonment had not been so long as the period that elapsed between the absence of Maggs and the sound that was to signify to him that it was his cue to advance along the passages towards the lobby.

At length, just as he was getting quite maddened by the delay, he heard a faint, but long-continued whistle.

"Time—time!" said Duval, and he bounded along the vaulted passage with the speed of the wind. "It is time—it is time!"

Let us now see what Jack and Dick, with their six friends, are really doing, and how far they have progressed in the affair, the success of which they had so deeply at heart.

CHAPTER CCCXII.

THE CONTEST WITH THE TURNKEYS ENDS SUCCESSFULLY FOR CLAUDE DUVAL.

If the space of time that intervened between dark and the hour when the onterprise in which Jack and Dick Turpin felt themselves so deeply interested felt long and tedious to Maggs and to Claude Duval, it was likewise so to all concerned in the daring attempt that was about to be made to take from Newgate its most important prisoner.

A thousand doubts and surmises beset Dick Turpin and Sixteen-string Jack. They thought at one time that, after all, the man who had been engaged by Maggs to procure all the necessary materials for the conduction of the enterprise might suspect what it meant, and so might think it better worth his while to make good terms with the authorities than to keep his word with the thieves; but reflection always put an end to such a doubt, by showing that the interest of that man must be much more in keeping than in breaking faith with his employers.

But, still, some chance accident might at the last moment knock the whole affair upon the head, or Maggs might be suspected, and in that case they would only be running upon certain destructiou by going to Newgate.

But, still, they never for a moment wavered in the fixed determination to go, so intent were they upon carrying out the plan, although they incessantly vexed themselves with so many suppositions regarding the possibility of failure.

We may add, too, that their doubts did not tend to make them a whit less exact or careful in making all the preparations in their power for the successful carrying out of the plan; they determined, unless they heard something positive as a stay to it from Maggs, to stand or fall by it.

But the longest looked-for day and hour will come at last, and so Dick and Jack found that it was time for them to leave the public house in Barbican, and proceed to the street at the back of St. Martin's-le-Grand, to meet those who were to go with them on the enterprise to Newgate.

As Jack and Dick were to present themselves as emissaries from the secretary of state's office, they had got themselves up in theatrical fashion accordingly, and very well they did it.

They both wore powdered wigs, which at that time were very much the fashion at the court, and Dick had on a suit of grey velvet, which looked very neat. Jack arrayed himself in a dark brown suit, and they both had paid great attention to the richness of their cravats and ruffles.

When they looked at each other they could not help smiling at the great metamorphosis which an alteration of costume so completely had effected in them both.

"I should not have known you, Jack," said Dick.

"Nor I you, Dick."

"Well, if we could have deceived each other, it will go hard but we deceive those who, at the best, have but a very superficial and slight knowledge of either of us."

"It will; and now that I see both of us in our disguises, a feeling of greater hopefulness comes over me. I seem as if I were assured we should succeed."

"That is a good feeling. You ought to encourage it. But come, now, it is time."

It was truly an expedition of life or death that they went upon, and they were well armed for the occasion. They had not made such an understanding distinctly in words; but it was a kind of tacit resolution between them that they would not be taken alive, and that, therefore, there were but three things that could happen to them on that night.

First, they might get away with Claude safely; secondly, they might fail in rescuing him, but yet escape themselves; and, thirdly, they might die in Newgate, or on the outside of it, fighting against an overwhelming force.

Such a state of things as this may not make men sad, but it cannot lead to much positive cheerfulness; so we can hardly be surprised that Jack and Dick were more than usually grave upon that eventful night.

The man who had been employed by Maggs to get ready all the materials for the enterprise was to the full as good as his word, and all anxiety upon that score was soon at an end.

Near the corner of Monkwell-street, at the back of St. Martin's-le-Grand, Jack and Dick found the chariot which had been bargained for, and at a little distance they saw the six mounted men who were to take part in the affair.

"All's right, Turpin," said a voice from the carriage, as Dick reached the door of it.

"Ah! who speaks to me?" said Turpin.

"It's all right," added the voice; and then the chariot door was opened, and the man of whom Maggs had hired the things stepped out. "I thought," he added, "that in case of any mistake, I had better be here on the spot myself, you see."

"And you know me?"

"To be sure I do."

"Well, I am rather sorry to hear that, for I had flattered myself that my disguise was perfect; but now you have taken that conceit out of me."

"Not at all. I heard your friend there, whom I don't know at all, call you Dick; and putting this and that together, and having a precocious idea upon the subject, though, of course, I didn't ask Maggs any questions, why, I said to myself, 'This is Turpin, and he is going to make a bold dash to get Duval out of the stone-jug.'"

"You are right."

"I thought I was; and now, as Maggs knows me well, and as you have heard of me, and, perhaps, have a pretty good idea that I may be trusted, I have one request to make to you."

"What is it?—our time is short."

"It is, that you will let me come with you. I am not the worst hand in the world at a tussel if it should come to one, and I am well armed, and will do you all the service I can,"

"Come on, then; you will, no doubt, be a great help to us. What say you to it, Jack?"

"I agree, with all my heart."

"Which Jack is that?" said the man.

"That I will tell you after this night's business is over," said Jack. "It is a long story, and there is no time now. Let us come on. Get into the coach again, Mr. a—a——"

"Nabbs," said the man. "That's what I call myself for shortness; but I ain't going to get into the coach—one of the most troublesome things in the world is to find one who can drive well, and who will fight well at the same time; so, if you will let me be your coachman, I can do you more good, I think, than in any other way."

"We are much beholden to you," said Dick.

"All's right," said Nabbs; and he attired himself in a huge livery great coat, with about twenty capes, and which effectually hid all his other clothing. In fact, all that could be seen of him was his top-boots beneath the coat, and his head above it. He then put on a regular coachman's wig, and a three-cornered hat, and he looked just the beau-ideal of a State-coachman in undress.

"That is famous," said Jack.

"The very thing," said Dick; "and now off we go at once, I hope?"

"Yes—all's right."

The six mounted men approached the carriage, and one of them said to Dick—

"It is all right now; we have all the horses with us, that is to say, one a-piece for ourselves and one for Claude. Where are your cattle, Turpin? They ought to be handy."

"They are at the crib in Barbican; but we can easily get them in good time. Remember what you have to do."

"Yes. Everything is right. The horses will be taken care of at the corner of Newgate-street."

The lamps were lit in the chariot, and then, indeed, Dick and Jack saw that it was quite a stylish set out, and much they wondered where Mr. Nabbs had been able to procure such a vehicle.

"All's right," said Nabbs.

Off they set at a dashing pace for Newgate, and as Dick and Jack rested upon the soft, cushioned seat of the chariot, they could not help looking at each other and asking themselves if it were not all a dream.

It did seem so strange that they should be in such a vehicle, and wear such costumes, and driving to Newgate. But there they were, sure enough, and as the carriage turned into Newgate-street, they felt that the time for thought had gone past, and that for action had arrived.

"You can depend upon your arms, Dick?"

"Oh, yes, Jack; and you?"

"Yes—I have been particularly careful. What an hour the next will be, Dick, to all of us!"

"Ay, it will. But its result will depend upon ourselves. Be cool, cautious, and firm, Jack. You do not feel in any way flurried?"

"Oh, no. I am going to try to save Claude, and that feeling nerves me. You will not find me fail. Here we are."

"Yes—here we are."

With a dash and a rattle the chariot stopped at the gate of Newgate—that little wicket gate at the top of the three or four stone steps, up and down which so many beating hearts have been carried by unwilling feet. Oh, if those old grey stones could only speak, what recollections might they not impart of the numerous personages who had passed them!

The lights at the sides of the chariot flashed upon the rugged wall of the prison, and a man, dressed very nicely as a footman, opened the door, and stood with it in his hand respectfully for Dick and Jack to alight.

Now, in stopping the chariot, in opening the door, and in letting down the steps, all the noise that could be made was made, so as to impress upon the minds of the turnkeys that it was somebody of importance who had arrived; for noise and insolence go a long way with the vulgar. Hence the assumption of both, by those who wish to exert a sway over weak and ignorant minds.

Dick stepped out of the chariot first, and then Jack followed him. By the light of the carriage lamps, Dick took one glance at Jack's face; but he saw that it was quite firm, and betrayed no anxiety or tremour.

"He will not fail," said Dick, to himself; and ascending the steps, he kicked at the low half-door of Newgate.

"Hilloa!" said the turnkey, in a half-sleepy tone.

"Open the door, fellow!" said Dick.

"Eh?—Oh, I beg your pardon, sir—yes, sir—Walk in."

The turnkey had caught sight of the chariot—the lights—the coachman, with his coat of many capes, and the footman with his shoulder-knot of gold lace. The gate was flung open, and Dick entered the lobby of Newgate, followed by Jack.

There was an awful pause for a moment, only broken by the sharp click of the lock, as the turnkey closed the wicket again. The two other officers of the prison, whose duty it was to remain in the lobby, rose from the bench upon which they had been sitting, and stared at the visitors.

"The governor is within, of course," said Dick, in the same sharp tone of command that he had previously spoken in.

"Yes, sir."

"Your lordship is sure to find him at this hour," said Jack.

"Very true, your grace," said Dick.

At these, words the turnkeys all made a low salaam to the spirit of nobility, that worshiped genius of Englishmen. The idea that one of the visitors was a lord and the other a grace was quite sufficient to induce the turnkeys to place, their necks under their feet if they demanded it.

"Take this despatch from the Secretary of State," said Dick, as he produced the long official-looking letter that Maggs had prepared, "and give it to the governor, and say, that two gentlemen are waiting. That will do, your grace I think?"

"Certainly, my lord," said Jack.

One of the turnkeys on duty darted forward, and with a low bow and a look of great reverence took the letter.

"I will call upon the governor at once, if you please," he said.

"The gentlemen will, perhaps, step into the chaplain's private-room?" said the other officer.

"Oh, no, we prefer remaining here," said Dick. "I believe we do, your grace?"

"Certainly, my lord," said Jack. "It amuses us."

"It does—it does. The novelty of the thing is something. You can take the letter, but there is no particular hurry, my man. Don't alarm the governor by awakening him too rapidly."

"No, sir—my lord—your highness, I mean."

The officer was so impressed by the dignity of the visitors, that he fairly backed out of their presence.

"And so," said Dick, as he only waited to allow the turnkey time to get out of hearing, "this is the lobby of Newgate?"

"Yes, my lord."

"Ah! To be sure. A singular place, your grace."

"Oh, very," said Jack. "I think it will do now."

"Yes, so do I. You take that one, and I will take this."

Before the astonished officers could come to any conclusion as to what these singular words from the two distinguished noblemen could possibly mean, Dick sprang upon the man on the lock like a tiger, and grappling him by the throat, he said in a low voice—

"One word—one cry—one movement indicative of alarm, and by Heaven I will break your neck."

Jack made a dart at the other officer, and with such force that they both fell on to the floor together, and the back of the turnkey's head came with such a ringing blow against the stone floor that he lay nearly insensible. Jack was sorry to have to do it, but too much was at stake in the whole adventure for him or any one to stand upon ceremony, so he seized the officer by the cravat, and lifting his head about six inches from the floor, he brought it down again with another blow that effectually stunned him.

That officer never spoke again.

It would be difficult to say what condition of mind the officer's, whose duty it was to keep watch and ward in the lobby of Newgate were thrown into by this most unexpected attack. Certainly, if the roof of the prison had fallen in and buried all beneath it in one common ruin, they could not have been more utterly astounded.

But no time was given them for reflection.

As for the turnkey that Dick had hold of, he began tot urn black in the face from the pressure on his throat, and Jack, coming toward, them, said—

"I have disposed of my man, and will gag this fellow. I have a gag made with a cork and a piece of string, that will just do it."

THE APPAPITIONS IN THE GARDEN OF HAWTHORN-HOUSE.

In another moment the man was past all power of speech; and so exhausted was he by the choking process that had been going on, that, when Dick let go of him, he fell as if dead to the floor.

All this happened, inasmuch as it happened simultaneously, in much less time than it has necessarily taken us to relate it. Indeed, one minute had not elapsed altogether from the commencement of the attack before Jack and Dick were undoubted masters of the lobby of Newgate.

So well arranged was everything, that they knew what to do next without any bother. Jack turned the key in the lock of the wicket, and opened it, stretching out his arm as a signal.

From behind the coach, then, whither they had crept, the six members of the family who were to assist in the affair emerged, and rushed up the steps of Newgate and into the lobby.

At the same moment, Maggs appeared from the narrow passage leading to the cells.

CHAPTER CCCXIII.

THE ESCAPE AND THE PURSUIT—AN EXCITING SCENE.

So far, then, the enterprise had been eminently successful, and it owed all its success to the daring nature of it.

If there had been the least tampering with the difficulties that presented themselves—if there had been the smallest amount of shrinking from what there was to do, a total failure must have been the result; but all was done, on the contrary, with calmness and absolute decision.

The turnkeys and officers in the lobby could scarcely believe their senses. They looked about them like men in a dream.

Maggs was pale, but firm.

"Ah! what is this?" he said, for he was intent upon keeping up the character of being as much surprised at the attack as the turnkeys were.

"We will show you," said Turpin; and he took hold of Maggs by the arm with his left hand, and clapped a pistol at his head with the other. "Show me the way to the cell of Claude Duval, or you are a dead man. Which is it to be?"

"I am cowed," said Maggs. "I can't help it. This way," he added, in a whisper to Turpin.

They both passed out of the lobby down the narrow passage leading to Claude's cell, and were met by a turnkey, who had a newspaper in his hand, and who said—

"What's the matter in the lobby, Maggs?"

With a blow from the butt-end of a pistol, Turpin stretched that man insensible on the stone floor. At the instant, then, Claude Duval sprang forward, and grasping the hand of Turpin, he cried—

"My dear friend, is it, indeed, you? Have you placed yourself in this frightful peril for me?"

"Quick," said Maggs, "on every moment hangs a life!"

"That's true," said Turpin. "Come on."

They were in the lobby again in a moment, and just as they reached it, the man who had gone with the letter to the governor came back, and said—

"The governor says he——"

Sixteen-string Jack had the man by the throat before he could say another word, and thrusting the barrel of a pistol into his mouth he whispered—

"One cry, and your brains spatter that wall."

"All's right," said Turpin.

"One moment," said a voice; "now all's right."

The members of the family, who had been admitted by the wicket, had been busy tying the turnkeys, both by their ankles and wrists, to each other, so that they were completely helpless.

"Open the door," said Jack.

"It is."

Ding—dong! went a bell, and then furiously it pealed forth an alarm. They looked at each other aghast.

"The alarm bell," said Jack. "I have heard it once before. Fly!"

"But who has rung it?"

"Don't stop to ask that. All we have to do is to get out of reach of it."

The wicket was flung open, and the members of the family only hung back a moment or two to allow Claude Duval and his particular friends to pass.

It was then that Dick Turpin turned upon the threshold of Newgate and addressing the turnkeys, he said—

"Now, my men, I know that you will have to put the blame of this affair upon somebody, and it is as well that the saddle should be placed upon the right horse. I will, therefore, tell you that it is my doing, and I am Richard Turpin."

The turnkeys uttered various groans, and in another moment Claude and his friends were in the open street.

The coach was gone. It had done all that it could do, and the instruction to those who had charge of it was to drive off at once as soon as the melee fairly began in the lobby of Newgate. This looked like desertion; but it was not such in fact, for the coach, after the affair had made that progress, could not possibly answer any good purpose.

It would have been absurd to try to escape by its aid, as such a vehicle would have stood no chance against the most ordinary pursuit, putting out of the question the fact that it could have been so very readily overtaken.

"Now for the horses, Claude," said Turpin; "they are, as they should be, at the corner of Newgate-street."

"It seems like a dream," said Duval.

"No—no," said Jack, in a voice of great emotion; "it is no dream, it is all true, and you are saved."

Claude pressed Jack's hand, and they all went up the street in a throng. They had not got above half-way, though, between the wicket of the prison and the corner of Newgate-street, when they heard some sounds of strife in advance of them.

"Dick," said Jack, "forward."

"Push on," cried Claude. "There is no time for hesitation, now. Push on, I beg of you."

"We have no need," said Dick. "Those of our friends who have charge of the horses are coming back to us here."

The noise assumed a more serious character, and in a few moments it was quite evident that something was amiss. What that something was, then explained itself, as one of them who had charge of the cattle came running towards Claude and his friends, saying—

"The watch—the watch! Where are you all?"

"Here," said Turpin. "What is it?"

"A strong party of the City watch came upon us, and tried to take us into custody with the horses."

"Ah, indeed! Forward, friends—forward!"

The flash of the lanterns of the watch, and the rattle of their staves, now came quite plainly upon the ears of the confederates, and those noises, joined to the incessant clanging of the prison bell, made up a species of alarm that in a little time must be productive of serious consequences to the fugitives, if they could not rapidly escape from so dangerous a vicinity.

The sudden charge of Claude and his friends, with the members of the family with them, had the effect of routing the watch.

Dick got hold of one of the iron short staves then in use by the night-watch, and laid about him with such effect, that half-a-dozen of the foe were prostrated in a few moments.

There was one watchman who was a tall, powerful man; and, while he fought with his stick, he continued with his other hand to spring his rattle, so that he engaged the enemy and gave an alarm at the same time.

Maddened by excitement and the dread of being dragged back to his cell at Newgate, Claude Duval, with a cry of rage, sprang upon the man, and they both fell together. To wrest his rattle from him, and give him a blow on the head with it, that put an end to his mortal career, was then, to Claude, the work of a moment; and he rose, flushed and heated, to his feet.

The watch were dispersed.

"Now, Claude, off with you," said Dick. "Don't stop another moment. Mount—mount at once!"

"D—n that prison bell," said Jack.

"Is it one?" said a voice.

"Yes," said Dick. "Disperse now."

Upon this, the members of the family who had done such good service, and who, up to that time, had kept by Claude and his friends, with one accord scampered away in different directions. Some took their course up Giltspur-street into Smithfield—some ran down Skinner-street, and found shelter in the rookery to the right of Holborn Hill, and others again made their way into the city, and some to the district at the back of the Royal Exchange.

In the course of half-a-minute they were all gone.

The only persons that remained then upon the spot of the encounter with the City watch were Claude Duval, Dick Turpin, Jack, and the landlord of the public-house in Barbican.

"Where is Maggs?" said the landlord.

"He stays. He is not suspected," said Dick. "Come on."

They were all on horseback in a moment, now; and, for the first time, then, since he had left the lobby of Newgate, Claude Duval felt as if he might draw a long breath. The effect of feeling that they were on horseback once again, was very great upon Dick and Jack. They both felt as though, at that moment, all danger had ceased, and the daring enterprise had thoroughly succeeded in every possible way.

"Off with you all," said the landlord; "and as there is no pursuit, I will go home at once. If there had been, I should have ridden a few miles into the country with you; for an extra hand might be of great service to you all, just now."

"It might be everything," said Claude; "but, thank Heaven, it is not wanted, I live—I breathe again."

They had just put the horses in motion, when they heard a shout behind them, and the clatter of horses' feet, and they all looked round, and directed their glances towards Newgate. The sight that then met their gaze was quite sufficient to show them that all was not over quite yet, and that, probably, the danger of the enterprise was only then in earnest about to begin.

It was well known that at an inn-yard, immediately opposite to the door of the common entrance to Newgate, some half dozen horses were always kept, night and day, ready for the road, in case of any emergency requiring their use. The spectacle that met the eye of Claude and his friends, then, consisted of these horses being brought out, and of a throng of men waiting to mount them, and eagerly putting themselves ready for a chase after the fugitives.

"Ah," said Dick, "we shall have some rough work, yet."

"We shall, indeed," said Jack.

Claude's eyes flashed with excitement as he glanced at the officers, and the colour deepened upon his cheek as he spoke.

"Let them come," he said. "This puts one in mind of old times. Don't it you, Jack? Let them come."

"It does, Claude."

"Which is to be our way?" said Dick Turpin.

"North," said Jack.

"So be it," said Claude. "On—on."

"I go with you," said the landlord. "Four can make a better fight than three can."

Without more ado, they all four now trotted down Skinner-street, for they felt that their cattle might have to do hard work, and they did not wish to put them to any speed at once. The valley of Holborn-hill lay before them, and then there was the ascent of the hill—which was much worse than it is now—so that they prudently saved the speed and the courage of their horses.

Any one, now, to see the four men trotting so quietly and so comfortably down the hill, would little have suspected that they knew they would be followed by those who were armed for their destruction, and that, in reality, it was a matter of life or death with them.

As regarded the pursuit of the officers, though, one of two things must take place at its outset.

In their eagerness of the pursuit, the officers might put their horses to all the speed they could muster at once, and so incapacitate them for any long-continued exertion, or they must imitate the more prudent conduct of the highwaymen, and trot gently and easily until they came to a level, when, after the horses had got warmed to their work, they would be able to act much more efficiently.

In either of these cases, the fugitives would be able fully to maintain the advantage with which they started, for they would be upon the level before the officers could reach them either way, and the probability was, that they were very much better mounted than the police could possibly, upon the spur of the occasion, be.

"Take it easy," said Dick, as they passed the end of Fleet Market—"take it easy. I don't see anything of them yet."

"It's all right, if we once get the rise of the hill between us and them," said Jack. "If they blow their horses in galloping up it, or walk them to save their breath, it will be equally good for us."

"There they are," said the landlord of the public-house.

CHAPTER CCCXIV.

THE CHASE FOR THE FUGITIVES CONTINUES INTO THE OPEN COUNTRY.—AN ENCOUNTER.

Even as the landlord spoke, the mounted officers, to the number of nine men, well armed, and eager for the recapture of the prisoner, for whom they were offered at once five hundred pounds amongst them, appeared upon the brow of Snow-hill, a few paces from St. Sepulchre's Church.

Under ordinary circumstances, the proximity of the officers to Claude and his friends, would have been rather alarmingly close; but, considering the nature of the ground, the distance was in reality great.

The officers only paused a moment to catch sight of their prey, as they fully believed Claude and his party must soon become, and then, with loud cries, they dashed onwards.

It was quite evident that they thought their numbers would suffice to put an end to all opposition, and to take prisoners of the small mounted party at once, and hence they disregarded the hill, but went down it at a pace that alarmed their cattle.

By good luck, rather than any good management, they all reached the hollow of Fleet Market in safety, for nothing alarms a horse more than to hurry him from a stable, and ride him recklessly in the dark down a hill. If they had had two or three falls among them, it would only have been in the natural order of things.

But, as we say, luck befriended them, and they reached the hollow in safety; but by that time Duval and his friends were at Holborn Bars.

Without the slightest pause, then, the officers spurred their already frightened cattle up Holborn-hill, which was the most foolish thing they could possibly do; for when they reached the top, it was not possible to get a good clear gallop out of the horses.

Claude and his party had reached St. Giles's by that time, and the horses were in as fresh a condition as when they started—in fact, they were in a better condition for work, for they were just getting warm and comfortable.

The officers, then, began to find out the mistake they had made in going off with such a burst, and they patted their horses, and only walked them between Ely-place and Holborn Bars.

Thus they lost more time than as if they had taken things easily at first, which is generally the case in all concerns of life, as well as in horse-riding.

Now, the highwaymen began to show the great advantage of the judicious manner in which they had managed their steeds, for they started up Tottenham-court-road at such a pace, that it was a doubtful thing if the officers' horses could come near it under any circumstances; and yet it was an easy pace, too, and by the time they emerged into the Hampstead-road, they were all four abreast, and going at a steady gallop, which the horses kept up without the use of whip or spur.

The officers, however, had done all they could to repair the error they at first committed at starting, and having, in some measure, allowed their horses to get breath enough, they, too, fairly began the chase, and the retreating party could hear the clatter of the horses' feet as they came on at all the speed they could make after them.

"Do we beat them?" said the landlord.

"Yes," said Jack; "three setps to two."

"That will do."

Camden Town was passed, and then came the district of Pancras Vale, during which the highwaymen allowed their horses to moderate their pace a little, as the road was very heavy in that place, as, in fact, it generally is, from taking so much of the surface drainage of the high land to the north of it.

Jack now pushed on a few paces to advance, for no one could be better acquainted with the North-road than he was. He knew every house and every tree upon it; and so was a most efficient guide, indeed, to the others.

Dick now and then looked back, but he could see nothing of the officers, and the sound of their horset' feet was no longer to be heard, either; but that might be owing to the fact that they were off the stones, and were on soft country road.

"We distance them," said Claude, "I think."

"And I know it," said Jack. "Follow me, and keep to this side of the hill, here, and we shall be able to get up it at a better pace."

The hill they had reached, now, was that which constitutes the great evil of the Hampstead road for horses and carriages. Haverstock-hill was at that time completely destitute of houses on either side.

With the exception of the old inn, the Load of Hay, and Steele's Cottage, as the little white cottage to the left of the road just on the summit of the hill was called, owing to its having been the residence of Steele, the essayist, there were no houses after leaving the centre of Pancras Vale.

Up Haverstock-hill they went at a walk; and when upon the summit of it, just by Steele's cottage, they all turned, as if by one accord, to look back from that eminence at their pursuers, and at the great city they had left behind them.

In the middle of Pancras Vale they saw the officers coming on at full speed.

"One—two—three—four—five—six—seven—eight—nine of them," counted Dick Turpin. "That's rather long odds, don't you think, Claude Duval?"

"It's no matter," said Claude. "Nine horses make no greater speed than one, and we must never let them get near us."

"But yet," added Dick, "what say you to having a shot at them for this pursuit?"

"Better not," said Jack. "Push on, I say. They must walk up this hill—that is as clear as fate; and by the time they stand upon this spot, we may be on Hampstead Heath, if we like."

"On—on, then!" said Claude.

"Follow!" cried Jack. "I can take you easily up the next hill, and I think we had better go right through the village."

"Be it so."

Jack was well mounted, and he now put the horses of his friends to their metal, for he got over the bit of hard ground at a tremendous rate. It is but a mile, after all, although, after traversing the hill, it looks a long one; but the mounted highwaymen were over it, and walking their steeds again up Red Lion Hill, in an incredibly short space of time, indeed.

They could now see nothing of the officers, as they were hidden by the brow of Haverstock-hill.

"Is it that we are so high in the world," said Dick, "that makes the place look so bright?"

"No," laughed the landlord; "but the morning is coming. We shall have broad daylight about us in another hour, or hour and a half at the outside. Don't you see how the white fog down there on the low heath is coiling about, and beginning to think of dispersing for the day?"

"Oh, yes; I see it—I see it,"

"It is a sweet sight," said Claude Duval, "after a time spent in a cell in Newgate."

"On—on!" said Jack.

They followed him up Red Lion Hill, and keeping to the side of the road to the left, they avoided some of the steeper bits, and so they rode through Hampstead without meeting a living soul, for no one was yet up; and just as they turned Heath-street into the open heath, the officers in pursuit were trotting up Red Lion Hill, and beginning to have some serious doubts with regard to the success of their enterprise.

"Confound him!" muttered one of them; "I know what Claude Duval is; and that Turpin, too; they would think nothing of going right on for a couple of hundred miles, for the fun of the thing."

"But their cattle would fail them," said another.

"Hang them, I don't know that. Those fellows know how to manage a horse, so as to get just about double the work out of him that any one else can at about half the distress."

"Is it true," said another, "that Turpin rode to York with hardly a stop by the way?"

"Yes, it is; and some said that he killed his Black Bess by so doing; but he didn't; for if my eyes don't deceive me, she is now on the road, for he rides her at this present time."

"The pursuit is hopeless."

"Who says that?" cried the chief officer. "Who says pursuit is hopeless, I should like to know?"

"I did, Mr. Godfrey."

"Oh, it's you Maggs, is it? Well, I certainly should not have thought you were the sort of man to flinch."

"I ain't flinching, Mr. Godfrey; but I say that, if Dick Turpin is on his black mare, Bess, as her calls her, we may go after him to the borders of England before we catch him."

"Never mind about how Turpin is mounted," said the chief officer. "He won't, after all he has done, and after all that has happened, desert the others, and you should recollect they have not all of them a devil in the shape of a black mare to carry them about."

"That's true," said Maggs.

"Then it's not much consequence what Turpin could do, if he don't do it; so come on. We will, and we must have them. Recollect that there is a price upon Turpin's head, as well as upon Duval's."

"That's all right enough. But who are the other two, Mr. Godfrey, do you think? Who can they be?"

"Nobody, you may depend; and very likely, if it came to a brush, they would be off, and leave Turpin and Duval in the lurch. Then I don't myself see how nine men are not to take two."

"I don't know that," muttered one of the officers. "That Duval is a brave devil for fighting, and so is Turpin. It will be the death of a few of us, I reckon; but come on—I'm willing."

"So am I," said Maggs.

"That's right, comrades," said the chief officer. "Willingness does anything and everything in this world."

It will be seen, by this brief conversation that had taken place among the officers, that they had not, after all, a very great hope of being able to capture Duval and his friends, although they felt that it was their duty to continue to endeavour so to do, let the peril they would have to encounter in so doing be what it might; so on they went up the hill.

In the meantime, Claude Duval and his friends had fairly emerged on to the open heath, and the first living things they saw, were a couple of men, well mounted, and in scarlet hunting-coats.

It appeared. too, that the two huntsmen, who, no doubt, were going across the country to the meeting of somebody's hounds, saw Claude Duval and his party at the same time, for they stopped and looked at each other a little incredulously.

"What the deuce do they mean?" said Dick. "Surely two men are not going to stop us all four on suspicion?"

"Hardly," laughed the landlord.

After a few words with each other, the two gentlemen in the scarlet coats trotted gently on towards the party that was advancing, and when they got near enough to speak, one of them said—

"Are you officers?"

"No," said Dick.

"It's them! Come on—come on!"

As he spoke he turned his horse's head on one side, and was about to gallop off, but Claude caught his horse by the bridle, saying—

"Sir, what made you ask that question of us?"

"Hands off, rascal, or I will knock you down! What is it to you why I asked it? I don't know but I ought to detain you all, for you may be the very man who escaped from Newgate a few hours ago."

Claude and his friends looked at each other in amazement, for they could not imagine by what process this man had found out the fact that they had escaped, when they had ridden at tolerable speed all the way, and the news could hardly have got to Hampstead Heath before them.

Turpin had laid hold of the bridle of the other mounted man, and for a few moments there was silence on both sides.

"You have done it, Mr. Mills," said he who had not before spoken.

"Done what?" said Claude.

"I will say no more," said Mr. Mills, as his friend called him. "Hands off, fellow. I am armed, I tell you, and you will best consult your own safety by letting me pass you, and riding on."

THE WOUNDED SPY INFORMS THE "FAMILY" OF THE PLACE BEING BESIEGED.

CHAPTER CCCXV.

DETAILS VARIOUS ADVENTURES ON THE GREAT NORTH ROAD.

CLAUDE DUVAL was so surprised at the fact of a person leisurely riding up Hampstead Heath having a knowledge that there had been an escape from Newgate only a few hours before, that he was not at all disposed to let him go until he explained the mystery.

"Hark, you, sir," said Claude. "It's a bad thing to be too curious, but in one's own affairs we may be pardoned the feeling. If you don't tell me this moment, for we have no time to spare, how you came to be aware that there had been an escape from Newgate, I will blow your brains out."

As he spoke, Claude took a pistol from his saddle, and placed the muzzle of it in rather uncomfortable proximity to the eye of the gentleman in the scarlet coat.

"Would you murder me?"

"Yes. One—two—three—four——"

"Stop! What are you counting for?"

"I am going to pull the trigger at twelve. Five—six—seven—eight—nine."

"Stop! I will tell you. The governor of Newgate sent a man on a fleet hunter across the country to let all the magistracy know of the fact of the escape of Claude Duval from prison, and it was only ten minutes ago that he called at my house, yonder, and told me, and then he galloped on."

"You are a magistrate, then?"

"I am."

"And your friend?"

"Oh, he is only a visitor of mine."

"And where, gentlemen, were you going?"

"To Edgeware, to meet the hounds."

"Will you give me your word of honour that you will go on your way, and take no notice of having met us?"

"No."

"Very well. I don't blame you for saying no to such a proposition. I think if I were in your case I should say as much; but we shall be under the necessity of stopping your sport for to-day. Dick, we will leave these two gentlemen on foot, and take their horses with us for a few miles; then we will let them go, and, no doubt, their owners will get them easily again."

"I resist such treatment," said the gentleman who was with the magistrate, and he aimed a blow at Dick Turpin with his riding-whip, which was very heavily loaded. The blow missed, and Dick said, quite calmly—

"Don't try that again, sir. I have patience, but I don't know the moment when it may leave me."

Making a dart at this person, Dick got hold of him by the collar, and had him off his horse in a moment, and threw him on the heath.

The magistrate very quickly dismounted.

"One man," he said, "can do but little against four, and I don't think I can do any good at all by throwing my life away. Here is my watch, and here is my purse."

"Keep them, sir. As for your friend, he is fair game."

"I have him all right," said Jack, who had dismounted, and got a handsome gold watch, and a well-filled purse, and rather bulky pocket-book from the unhorsed man, who had been so roughly placed on the heath by Dick Turpin.

"Who are you?" said the magistrate to Claude.

"Guess," said Duval, with a smile.

"You are Claude Duval?"

"I am, sir. Good morning."

"Stop a moment—stop. Yet, no—I ought not—yes, I will. Don't go through North-end."

"Thank you, sir. Here is your horse again. Allow me to return him to you as fresh as I took him. You can go now, and enjoy your day's sport, and I hope it will be a good one."

"On—on!" cried Jack. "Look behind you, Claude."

Claude did look behind him, and he saw, just coming on to the heath, the officers, who had made their way up Holly-bush Hill, and so emerged a little to the westward of where Claude and his friends had come on to the heath.

"Hilloa! Help!—help!" shouted the gentleman who had been laid upon the ground by Turpin—"help!"

"You had better be quiet, sir," said Duval. "This is rather bad conduct of you."

"Murder!—murder!"

"On—on!" said Jack. "We have not a minute to lose."

They just paused to try to count the number of the officers who were now in pursuit, but they could not do so at once, so they would not delay time, and off they went along the heath road at a great pace.

"Recollect," cried Claude, "not to go by North-end."

"By Jove! we can't help it, now, for we are in the direct road for it," said Turpin. "Duval, you know we should have taken the right-hand road across the heath, if we meant to avoid North-end, and, instead of that, we have taken the left."

"It can't be helped now," said Claude. "Get your pistols ready."

They could hear the shouts of the officers, now, quite plainly as they came along the heath; but they very imprudently made a pause at the point where the encounter had taken place with the two huntsmen; for he who had been unhorsed by Dick Turpin was still calling out for help in such a way; that the officers fully expected he had been murdered, or was in some terrible extremity.

Every moment, now, was so precious to the fugitives, that in the little time that the officers paused around the gentleman in the scarlet coat, they increased their distance by double the space from their pursuers.

The real fact was, that some of the officers had not their hearts in the job that they were put upon at all. Well they knew that if they should succeed in coming to close quarters with those whom they were pursuing, it would be anything but an easy conquest they would make of them, if they made a conquest at all, which was an exceedingly doubtful proposition, as they well knew.

There were, as they saw, four desperate, determined men. They knew that one was Claude Duval, of whose courage the most fabulous stories were told, and passed current.

Another they knew was Dick Turpin, of whose prowess they likewise had had pretty good grounds to judge of. Then they could not doubt but that whoever the other two were that were to be found upon such an occasion in such company, they had been well chosen by Claude and Turpin.

It was no wonder, then, that, under such circumstances, the ardour of the officers should cool down a little as they proceeded.

That some four or five of them would probably be killed in the encounter with Duval's party, if such should take place, was a contingency that bore such an impress of truth, that it was difficult to doubt it; and, although the officers had no great tenderness for each other, yet the doubt as to which of them would fall for the benefit of the survivors was one of the most uncomfortable ideas in the world, and infected all the party with

"The pale cast of fear."

Hence, probably, it was that they were not very angry to find an excuse in the balling of the scarlet-coated gentleman on the ground to pause awhile, and to let the pursued get to a more respectable distance in advance of them.

Certainly, if one or two stopped, the others were sure to do so; for if they thought their force hardly strong as it was in its entire integrality, they would hardly think of dividing their force.

Indeed, if it had not been for the determined man who had the command of the party, the probability is, that the pursuit would never have lasted so far as Hampstead Heath at all; but he was a prudent man, and had a reputation to lose, as well as much to gain, by the affair.

"Now, sir," he said, to the scarlet-coated individual, "if you are dying, say at once who struck the blow, or fired the shot, for our time is valuable."

"Dying?"

"Yes. You are mortally wounded, I suppose?"

"No, thank God! Beyond a bruise, I fancy, owing to being rather roughly made to fall on the heath, I am not aware that anything is particularly the matter with me."

"Then why, in the name of all that is abominable, did you bawl out in that way so for?"

"To help to capture the rascals."

"Oh, bother take you. You have hindered us five minutes, and that's a mile. Come on, comrades, we will have them yet—come on."

"Yes—yes," said the others. "On—on!"

They said "On—on!" but if they could only have found some direct excuse for going down Hampstead-hill again, instead of turning along its heath, how much happier they would really have been—for the greater part of them, at all events.

In the meantime Claude Duval was not at all unmindful of the warning he had had not to pass through North-end, and he called out to his companions—

"There is danger at North-end; but our best plan is to dash through it, I think."

"So do I," said Dick Turpin.

"No doubt of that," said the landlord. "What is the danger, Claude Duval, do you know?"

"No."

"Never mind," said Dick. "On—on! is the word."

The reader who is at all familiar with the beautiful and picturesque Heath of Hampsted, is, no doubt, well aware that across it, going northward, there are two roads.

The road to the right leads to Highgate, if pursued for a distance of about one mile and a half.

The road to the left leads through North-end, towards Golden Green and Hounslow, one of the most country-like and picturesque portions of the environs of London even to the present day.

It was the road to the left that Claude Duval and his three friends took.

That road was, at the time of our story, exceedingly steep and percipitous, although it was partially lowered by a cutting being made through a high portion of the hill. That cutting is now very considerably lowered, so that as you proceed along that bit of road, you have a bank upon each side of you at some parts of thirty feet or more in height, covered to the right hand with luxuriant wild vegetation.

It was through this cutting, then, which terminates immediately upon the little cluster of houses called North-end, Hampstead, that Duval and his friends galloped at a good pace.

The idea that there was danger at North-end had induced them all to prepare for it as best they might.

Claude had pushed on a pace or two in advance, and had loosened his pistols in the holsters, so that they were ready for immediate use. The others had likewise seen that their arms were in order.

For a moment or two Claude was of opinion that the danger had not arrived, inasmuch as the place looked as peaceable and quiet as it possibly could; but it was only for a few fleeting moments that he had that opinion.

There is rather a steep descent just at the other side of North-end, known by the name of Golden-hill, and on one side of that—the left—was a garden wall, extending some distance along the road, and then branching at a right angle into a meadow.

Just as Duval reaced the brow of the hill there emerged from the corner of this wall ten or twelve mounted men, headed by one dressed like a gentleman, who immediately called out, in a loud voice—

"I summon you to surrender, in the name of the law."

"Oh, indeed," said Claude. "Charge!"

On they swept, but before they got up to the assemblage a rattling discharge of fire-arms came among them.

"Fire!" cried Claude.

Four well-directed pistol-shots in a moment were sent into the throng, and from the confusion that ensued it was pretty evident some mischief had been done among them.

"On—on!" cried Claude.

In an instant they swept past the officers, and in their progess Turpin knocked one man off his saddle by a well-directed blow from the handle of a heavy riding-whip that he had with him, and so they cleared the danger at North-end.

A slight attempt was made to pursue them, but soon given up; and when Claude Duval saw that, he drew rein at Golden Green, and said, anxiously—

"Is anybody hit?"

"No," cried Dick and the landlord both in a breath.

"Nothing of consequence," said Jack.

"Ah, they have touched you, Jack."

"In the arm, Claude, but really I don't think it is anything. I can bend my arm well enough, so the bone is not touched, and I think the bullet went right through and is gone, so that will be all the better."

"Confound them," muttered Claude, as he bound a handkerchief round Jack's arm, "they came out to hunt me with all the gusto that they would bring to the hunting of a fox."

"More of it, Claude," said Dick.

"Do not wait here," said Jack. "Never mind me, Claude, Lut us push on. It will not do to let the officers get up to us, you know."

"I don't know that," said Dick.

"You don't know it?"

"No, Jack. The fact is, my opinion of the officers is such that they will not, if they can help it, come to close quarters with us. They are pursuing a policy which is at once as cowardly as it will be effectual."

"What is that you say, Dick?" said Claude. "You have an idea, I see, about the conduct of the officers that we should all know. What is it?"

"I know his idea," said the landlord, as he patted his cheek with his handkerchief.

"Ah, you are hit, too," said Claude.

"You can't call it a hit. The fact is, one of the bullets just scraped the skin off my cheek, but it has begun bleeding now at a great rate. It is nothing, though."

"Narrow escapes both," said Claude, glancing at Jack and the landlord. "A little nearer and that straggling volley would have been fatal to us."

"Oh, do ride on," said Jack. "Why do we wait here?"

"On, then," cried Dick, "and I can tell you what my idea of the policy of the officers is, as we go along."

"Do so, Dick."

"Well, it is just this. They don't want to come up with us, but they want to hunt us, you see, always hoping that we may be constantly meeting other foes in front of us, who will have a shy at us and knock some of us over; and if that sort of fun goes on long, you know, why, in the natural order of things, we must at last be done for."

"That's about it," said the landlord. "You see, they know if they come to close quarters it will just be a brush for a few minutes, at the end of which some three or four of them will be put out of their troubles in this world, even although they should succeed in bringing us all down, and your officers don't like that way of doing business."

"Do you hear that, Jack?" said Claude.

"I do."

"And you agree with it?"

"It is, I am sorry to say, too sensible, and too much in accordance with my own experience, to doubt. It is quite clear that we must force them to close quarters, and take the chances of the fight. Just fancy our running the gauntlet through fifty miles of country in this sort of way. To be sure, if we could find a hiding-place, or play the double upon them, it would be better."

"They are too close upon our track for that," said Dick.

"Well, I'm rather afraid they are, Dick."

"And all this is on my account," moaned Claude.

"Don't you flatter yourself it is any such thing," said Dick. "That's not it at all."

"Oh, yes—yes, it is; and now I beg of you all three to ride on, and leave me at the first narrow part of the road, where I can make a good defence for some time, and so block up the passage until you can attain a place of safety."

"It's of no use your speaking in that way, Claude," said Dick; "we don't mean to do it, so there's an end of that. What now, Jack, in your experience and knowledge of the road, do you advise?"

"It is quite clear," said Jack, "that if we are to get into any hiding-place, or to double upon the officers across the country in any way, we must beat them off first, so that they shall, for a time, lose sight of us."

"True enough that, Jack."

"Then, the only way to do that is to make a bold stand somewhere that we can pick out for ourselves as favourable, and let them come up to us, and so give them a taste of our quality. The head of some well-wooded lane would be just the thing; and if we ride on a little further, we shall find plenty of such places."

"Agreed," said Dick. "Come, Claude, what do you say to that?"

"I say agreed, likewise, if you will not leave me."

"That we will not. Why, what could put such a thing into your head? Come on, now. We can get a little more speed out of our cattle; and as they will have a little rest, now is the time to do so."

Jack, by common consent, was permitted to take the lead, as his acquaintance with that road was an exceedingly intimate one, since it was for many years the scene of his early exploits. It might fairly be said of him, that upon that road—

"There was not a tree, a house, or stone,
To that bold rider there unknown;"

and at that time of day, changes did not take place so rapidly in the suburbs of London as they do now.

And yet, probably, as regards the natural scenery northward of the metropolis, after getting some six or seven miles off, we have less to lament in that way than we could possibly imagine.

In the surface of country lying between the road from Hampstead to Mill-hill on the one side, and the Edgeware-road on the other, there are some of the finest green lanes that any part of England can possibly exhibit.

There will be found real country vegetation; and although really so near to the great city, the silence and the country-look seem so natural, that we could place any one there, and make him believe that he was hundreds of miles away from London.

We trust that some of our readers will take an exploring walk to that locality.

The party now passed a little miserable road-side public-house, which looked as if the roof had crushed it; for it was all on one side, and conveyed the evident idea to any one that a tolerable kick would send the whole edifice over.

A couple of men at the door of the little hotel took a good stare at Claude's party as it flitted rapidly past; but no other notice was bestowed upon it.

They now got to rather a narrow bit of road, beyond which was a steep hill, to the foot of which a cart laden with a quantity of young timber had just arrived.

Jack drew up.

"Claude," he said, "there is only a boy with that cart of timber, and there is a lane close by here that will suit us very well; but it will suit us a great deal better if some of that timber were thrown across the entrance of it."

"Capital," said Claude. "Suppose we take possession?"

"Might must be might," said Dick, as he rode at once up to the boy, and called out to him.

"Hilloa, my lad! would you like a guinea or a knock on the head?"

"A guinea," said the boy.

"Very well, you shall have it; but you must obey our directions, and if you don't, you will get the knock on the head first, and then have to obey them after all."

"Eh?" said the boy, with such a stupid look, that it was pretty evident some parts of Dick's speech were completely lost upon him.

"Don't you understand me?"

"Anan!"

"Oh, well, I suppose you don't. Jack, where is the lane?"

"Just yonder, by the chestnut trees."

"Very well. Hold my horse a moment, some of you."

"I will," said Claude.

Dick Turpin at once dismounted; and laying hold of the leading horse of the two that drew the cart, he began to lead it to the corner of the lane.

"Stop!" said the boy. "I mustn't——'

"Get out of the way!"

"Oh, but—Murder!"

Claude had laid the lash of his whip over the boy's shoulders with an efficacy that rather startled him; and after putting himself into all sorts of grotesque attitudes to get rid of the pain, he called out—

"I'll go and tell maister."

And then off he set up the hill.

"A good riddance," said Dick.

A few moments sufficed to get the cart to the end of the lane, and then Dick unyoked both the horses, and let them go where they liked. The landlord dismounted, and helped Dick, so that they soon had out of the cart a lot of timber, and had formed a pretty good barricade at the end of the lane, and then they, by dint of great exertion, turned the cart over on its side likewise, so that the lane was completely stopped up for horsemen or carriages.

Of course, they had taken care not to shut themselves out.

All this working, with the good will that they set about it, did not take above five minutes to do, and then they all four dismounted, and looked carefully to their arms.

They found they could fire three volleys easily, without waiting to re-charge their weapons, so they considered they were pretty well provided against the contingencies of the combat.

Claude now looked more carefully than before to Jack's arm, and he had the satisfaction to find that it had ceased bleeding, although it was more painful than it had been some short time before.

"Don't attempt to move it, Jack," he said.

"I will not if I can help it," replied Jack. "Do you hear the officers, any of you?"

"No," was the general answer; and then Duval asked Jack if he knew where the lane led to.

"Yes," he replied; "it goes right away to Edgeware; but it takes many a turn and wind before you can get there by it, and in some places it is so narrow that the branches of the bushes on each side would touch even a foot passenger. Our object, though, will not be to pursue the lane above a mile or so, at all events. We can do better, I think, by then taking to the meadows, and keeping all snug till nightfall."

"Yes," said Claude. "When the sun of to-day sets I shall begin to think that all is right. We can give our horses a rest till midnight, and then I should say let us get westward of London, for in this direction there will be a hue and cry for a week to come."

"There will, Claude," said Dick. "But now I hear them. Keep close, all of you, and let the horses be as close to the trees as possible."

CHAPTER CCCXVI.

THE OFFICERS ATTACK CLAUDE AND HIS PARTY, AND GET THE WORST OF IT.

THE greatest possible care was taken now by Dick Turpin to put his own steed out of danger of chance shots, as well as those of his friends.

By tying the creatures by the bridles to some of the low branches of the trees that were in the hedgerow, they were pretty well protected from any mischief the officers could do them. Besides, it was not to be supposed that the officers would waste a shot upon a horse when they had a man to fire at.

The clatter of the horses' hoofs of the pursuing party cou ld now plainly enough be heard upon the road, and it was quite clear that in a few minutes they would reach the spot where Claude and his friends were, as it were, barricaded.

"They may pass us," said Jack.

"Well, it is possible," said Claude.

"But not very likely," said the landlord, as he still patted his cheek. "They keep rather too good a look out for that. If it were twilight now, such a thing might happen easily enough."

"Yes. But if it had been twilight," said Dick, "I think we could have done better than we are now doing."

"Hush!" said Claude. "Here they are."

Claude was right. The officers had reached the corner of the lane, and they all but passed it in their hurry; and if one of them had not uttered an exclamation, from which his companions conjectured him to be in danger, the chief of the party would have ridden on, without being aware that he was passing the very people he was so anxious to come up to.

"Hillioa!" cried that vigilant officer, who could not hold his tongue. "What's this?"

"What?" said the chief. "Ha, I see! Here they are. Halt!"

The officers reined in their prancing steeds.

"Nine of them," said Jack.

"Yes—only nine!" said Claude.

"Take care of yourselves," said Dick. "They have their pistols. What do you say, Claude, to giving them a taste of our quality?"

"I don't like to fire first upon these occasions," said Duval; "but in this case I feel that I am completely in your hands, and will do as you do."

"Well—well, let them have the first fire, then, if they like it."

"Look about, my men," said the chief officer. "The rascals are here, and we are sure to have them; but it is our duty to do so with as little loss as possible."

"Certainly," said all the officers.

The chief officer was a man of much courage, and heedless of the pistols of the highwaymen, which he could see plainly in their hands, he rode up close to the barricade they had erected at the corner of the lane, and spoke to them.

"Resistance is little short of madness," he said. "You know as well as I do that we must have you."

"Go back, sir!" said Claude.

"I know you, Claude Duval," added the officer; "and it is quite out of the question for you to keep at large. The whole country will be armed against you."

"Hark you, sir," said Dick Turpin, "I can inform you that we are determined to defend ourselves to the last extremity. If there should come any loss of life or any grievous hurts upon this occasion, they will lie at your door, inasmuch as if you leave us alone we will leave you alone."

MAGGS VISITS CLAUDE TO TELL HIM OF THE PROJECTED ESCAPE.

"Oh, this is nonsense!" said the officer. "I know you, too. You are Richard Turpin, for whose apprehension rewards the reach the sum of eight hundred pounds."

"I don't see," said Dick, "that the amount of the reward for me holds out any inducement to me to give myself up. I am not aware that I should get any of it."

"Perhaps you know me," said Jack.

"No, I don't—nor do I know your other companion; but Jack Ketch is not very particular."

"If we were angry now, and wished to take offence," said Turpin, "that speech would be your last."

"Oh, nonsense! you are not all out of your senses, I suppose? There can be no good in resistance."

"We are not convinced of that."

"Then convince yourselves. Here we are, more than two to one, and as well armed as you can possibly be, so what can you expect as the issue of a struggle?"

"We shall see."

"And, likewise, we are now doing our duty, while you are but criminals waiting justice."

"Don't it strike you that the preservation of our lives is about as strong a stimulus to exertion as your wish to get hold of the reward you speak of, my friend?"

The officer bit his lip at this; for, in his heart, he knew that he could not depend upon the men he had with him. Hence was it that he was so exceedingly anxious to make terms if he could with the foe.

"Now, listen to me," he said. "I dare not hold out any hopes to you, Claude Duval, nor to you, Richard Turpin, for you have both committed so many crimes that the law won't be interfered with; but I put it to you, now, whether it is not better quietly to give yourselves up without any more ado, than to be taken with the addition of another murder or two to answer for?"

"Cool, that," said Dick.

"Come, now, your answer."

"It is just this; that if I am attacked, and I defend myself, I think killing no murder."

"I am much of the same opinion," said Claude, "and so we mean to let you commence the strife; but woe be to you if you do; for I tell you, Mr. Officer, that, notwithstanding all your bother, not a man of you shall leave this spot alive. I am Claude Duval, and it is pretty well known that I ever do my best to keep my word."

"Well," said the officer, "you will see that—that—"

The officer, who was a little way off, looked dreadfully fidgety as Claude spoke the words we have recorded in his cool, calm, determined manner.

"I appeal to you two, who I do not know," added the officer. "Up to the present your only offence that I know of is, that you have ridden a few miles in the company of two notorious felons; but I warn you, if you lift a hand against the officers of justice you are with them equally guilty; so I ask you both to save your lives."

"Well, Jack," said Dick, "you hear him."

"It requires no answer," said Jack.

"Do you hear me?"

"Yes—yes. Go your way, man, and don't be making a fool of yourself by prating here such nonsense. You have had your answer. We are four to nine, it seems; but we mean to fight—That is all you require to know."

"Take that," said the officer, as he fired a pistol at Jack's head, "and that puts you at your ease, my fine fellow, whoever you are."

"Treacherous rascal!" said Claude, and on the instant, as the officer turned to fly, he fired at him.

The officer uttered a yell and fell back off his horse.

"Help! help!" he cried. "I—oh, help—dark—night—Fire! Oh mercy!"

The bullet had entered the back of his head, and with the utterance of that last word, "Mercy," he was a dead man.

"Jack, did he hit you?" said Claude.

"No."

"Thank God! Ah! what is this?"

The landlord of the public-house lay upon the ground, and his death-like pale face told the tale of where the officer's bullet had gone.

"You are hit, then?" said Claude.

"Rather. It passed Jack and found me, you see, that's all—that's all. I'm done for, now!"

"It was a foul and treacherous shot."

"Look out!" cried Dick Turpin.

The officers suddenly advanced and fired a volley, which was as promptly returned by Claude's party, although, now, they could only fire three shots at a time.

"At them again!" cried one of the officers, "one of 'em is done. At them again—fire away!"

Another volley came shattering among the trees, and Claude's hat flew off with a couple of bullets in it.

"Blaze away," said Dick, as calmly as possible, and he fired again. Claude and Jack did the same, and then again.

This continuous fire seemed rather to astonish the officers, and Jack, who was by the landlord, possessed himself of his pistols, and kept on firing at them.

Three of the officers had fallen from their horses to the ground, and another having his horse wounded, was ran away with at a mad gallop by the infuriated animal. Dick Turpin had received a slight wound, but Claude was unhurt. There were still five officers, however, to three of the highwaymen, and for a moment or two they ceased.

"Fire!" cried Claude.

They heard him, and in a moment one shouted out—"We shall all be killed!" and turned and fled. The others immediately followed his example, and they tore off at a much greater speed than they had ever exerted in pursuing the highwaymen.

"Load again," said Claude, "they may be back upon us."

Not a word was now spoken till all their pistols were loaded, and then Duval sprang upon the side of the cart and took a long look down the road.

"Do you see them?" said Turpin.

"Only just—now they are gone."

"We have won the fight, then!"

"Yes, but at such a loss," said Jack. "Look here, both of you. He is going fast now."

Claude jumped off the cart, and hastily approached the dying man. Dick, too, was in a moment by his side.

The landlord lay upon his back, and the expression of his face was quite sufficient to show that death had set his seal upon him. One of his hands was busily employed in plucking at the grass that was in great luxuriousness around the spot on which he lay.

"This is sad," said Claude.

"It is, indeed," sighed Jack. "It would have been better if the bullet had done the errand it was sent upon, and hit me."

"Poor fellow," said Turpin. "In his day he was a bold hand, and now he has come to the end that we would have said he had fairly escaped by retiring from the road."

"Can nothing be done for him?" said Claude, who was deeply affected at the death of that man who had done so much for him, and who may be said to have come by his melancholy end in his service.

"Nothing," said Jack.

Dick, too, shook his head.

"I feared as much," said Claude.

"Hush!" said Jack; "he speaks."

"Hold that one!" said the dying man—"Now, Claude—brave Claude—open the wicket—the court—no—no—gone! Listen how the bell tolls. Somebody is going—going——"

There was a horrible rattling sound in his throat, and they all three shrank back for a moment.

"This is horrible," said Claude. "How much better if the shot had at once been mortal!"

"He don't suffer," said Jack. "The mind is too far gone to take cognizance of suffering now."

"Help!—murder!" shrieked the dying man. "This is—death!"

He had half risen; but the effort was his last, and he fell back again like a lump of lead.

"Gone!" said Jack, with a shudder. "Peace be to you, old friend, and may your crimes find pardon where we must all sue for it, and let us hope not in vain—not in vain!"

CHAPTER CCCXVII.

THE GRAVE BY THE OLD OAK.—MORE ALARMS.

As Jack uttered the words with which we concluded our last chapter, he lifted his hat from his head. Dick did the same, and Claude, who was bare-headed, bowed low, in acknowledgment of the presence of the dead, and of the sentiment that had come from the lips of his friend Jack.

For the space of about three minutes none of them spoke; and then Jack broke the silence, by saying—

"We must provide a grave for him."

"Surely," said Claude.

Dick nodded.

"It shall be done," he said. "If all the officers in England were gathering in one sanguinary host to attack us, I would bury this poor piece of inanimation now. This is a lonely spot."

"It feels more loney now," said Jack. "The presence of the dead, I think, has the effect of making a shuddering solitude of such a spot as this."

"There is one thing that we ought to do," said Claude Duval, "in the cause of common humanity."

"What is that?"

"Look to our foes, who lie in the road. If any of them be not dead, let us do for them what we can."

"Agreed!" said both Jack and Dick Turpin, and they immediately followed Claude Duval over the logs of wood and the cart into the roadway, where lay the officers who had fallen.

A very few minutes sufficed to bring the three friends to the spot of the encounter, and the first body they came to was to that of the chief officer who had fired so treacherously at Jack, and killed the landlord of the public-house.

"Quite dead," said Dick.

"And he deserved his death," said Claude. "I cannot regret that shot. This one tried to commit what must be called an assassination, for it was nothing better."

"He did so."

They then went to the others, and in o y one was a spark of life discernible. He, when they tried to support him, just breathed one sigh, and then expired.

"All over," said Dick.

"What shall we do with them?" said Jack.

"They have many friends who will take charge of them," said Claude; "and, indeed, if we had both the means and the inclination to bury them all, it would be better not. All we need do with them is to draw them to the road-side, and there leave them."

"Be it so," said Jack. "Our own comrade we may inter; but these must go through all the ordeal of coroners' inquests, and all that sort of thing."

They now drew the four dead bodies to the grassy slope by the side of the road, and there they let them lie side by side, without making the least attempt to take anything from them. After that, Claude and his two friends went across the obstruction into the lane again, and then Claude saw that Jack had brought with him a couple of the broad cutlasses that the mounted police had worn.

"What are these for, Jack? We don't want them."

"Yes, we do, now. They are the only weapons we have with which to dig a grave for our poor friend here."

"True—true, Jack."

"You and Dick must do it; for, although I have all the will in the world to turn a sod for such a purpose, my arm, I fear, will not permit me to do so."

"Don't attempt it, Jack."

Dick Turpin and Claude Duval now looked out for a quiet spot, beneath which they could place the dead body of their friend, and finally they settled upon a patch of grassy ground, not far from a tree that grew standing by the side of a little stream that was close at hand.

The soil was of a loose and loamy texture, so that there was no great difficulty in displacing it. At first they took off the turfs very carefully and laid them aside, and then as they dug they cast some of the loose mould into the water, where it was washed away, and other portions of it they piled up by the side of the grave; and so, in the course of a quarter of an hour, they had a hollow of about four feet in depth.

The labour to dig so much as that, with the inefficient implements they had, was very great, and Dick and Claude were both glad enough when Jack said that they had gone deep enough.

"No one will disturb him, poor fellow," said Jack, "and if any one should hit upon the spot and feel inclined to do so, it is not with twelve miles in the depth of his grave that will save him."

They then carried the body carefully to the spot and placed it in the grave. Dick laid the hat of the deceased over his face, so that it should be not actually exposed to the pressure of the mould, and then Jack threw the first handful of mould upon the body.

"I don't know any funeral service," said Jack, "or I would say it over him, so he must do without.'

"It don't matter," said Dick, "for, of course, he can't help it whether a funeral service is said over him or not, one way or the other."

"To be sure not," said Claude, "so it can't make any difference to him. I'm afraid there would be no funeral service at all but for the fee to the parson."

"Very likely," said Jack.

In this primitive way, then—although certainly the opinions of the highwaymen regarding parsons was rather shocking, as if such pious people could ever care about fees, and tithes, and all that sort of thing! Pah! It is too bad!—Well, they covered up the poor dead landlord, and when they got the ground nearly level they laid the turfs carefully on the top in their proper places again, and made the surface all as smooth and as level as they could, so that by the time they had scattered some decayed leaves upon it, and then some water from the ditch to revive the grass again, nobody would have thought that so near the surface there lay so melancholy a victim of the affray that had taken place at the end of the lane.

"That's over," said Dick.

"Yes," said Claude; "and, now, the sooner we leave this place the better, I think. Don't you, Jack?"

"Yes; but what are we to do, now, with our spare horse?"

"Let him go."

"Very good. A horse cannot be long without a owner in England. He will pick up plenty to eat, too, in the meadows."

Jack, assisted by Turpin, made a gap in the hedge of sufficient width for the horse to go through; and then, divesting the creature of its saddle and bridle, they set it at liberty, and it bounded and frolicked in the meadows, to the great annoyance, no doubt, of the other horses.

"Now, it's off we are," said Dick. "Mount, Claude, and ride quick. We shall soon shake off the depression which the late event has cast upon us."

Claude mounted, and they all three went down the lane at a trot, which did not prevent them from conversing; so Claude, turning to Jack, said—

"Now, I think, you will admit, Jack, that I have shown very great forbearance?"

"In what?"

"In not pestering you with questions about Cicely."

Jack changed colour, and Dick Turpin touched his horse with the spur, and rode on a little in advance.

"What is the meaning of this?" said Claude. "Why do you both appear so disturbed at the question? All I want is to know where she is. That is simple."

"I will tell you, Claude."

"Do so."

"In the grave!"

Duval almost fell from his horse as Jack said this, and, in shrieking accents, he cried—

"Oh, no—no! Tell me that you have this information upon insufficient evidence—tell me that it is mere hearsay—tell me that you do not believe it—tell me anything in the world but that it is true!"

"Claude," said Jack, in a mournful tone of voice, "you never would believe it, although it was hinted to you, and Dick and I made up our minds to say nothing to you about it until you forced us by your questions. I now tell you that it is not mere hearsay—not a mere report—but a truth."

"Oh, Heaven!"

"She is no more."

"Kill me, Jack."

"No, Claude. This is a great shock to you, no doubt, but you must get over it as people do get over great shocks. You must not allow it to knock you down completely. That you should grieve is one of the most natural things in the world, but that you should grieve immoderately is one of the most unnatural things in the world; and you will recollect that Cicely suffers nothing now, and that when she drew her last breath she got to the end of all suffering."

"Jack you may have all the amazement, but I have all the feeling."

"Not all, Claude. I am sure that Dick and I both feel for you very much, but we both know that the misfortune that has happened is one that is not remediable, and we both know, too, that we must all die, and that

'Come it slow, or come it fast,
It is but death that comes at last.'

Come, be calm and composed."

"I will try—I will try!"

Claude hardly spoke during the remainder of that day, and he left it to his companions to choose a halting place for the night, which they did in a very sweet romantic dell at the foot of an eminence covered with young trees of beautiful growth.

In his vallise Dick Turpin had some provisions, and he unfastened it and made Claude partake of some; but they could not get him to shake off the gloom that hung upon his spirits.

Poor Jack was very much afraid that he meditated some wild and mad action, but Dick was of a different opinion, as such a crime would be contrary to Duval's usual mode of thought.

The night was now creeping on, and all about the secret spot where the three highwaymen had taken up their abode temporarily was enveloped in shadow. The low, soft notes of a few of the latest-roosting forest birds alone disturbed the stillness of the scene, and such sounds could scarcely be said to disturb it, since they rather added to its tranquil repose, and its calm beauty.

Claude Duval had thrown himself upon the ground, and placed his arm over his face, so that his companions could not see the expression of it; but well they knew that he was brooding over the death of Cicely.

Gladly—most gladly would Jack or Dick have said something to him to stem the current of his grief; but what could they say? Nothing but telling him that she yet lived could possibly rouse him, and to tell him that would be to assert what they knew to be untrue. No; there was no help for it but to let the grief of Claude Duval have its sway.

Jack and Dick left him to himself, and conversed together in low tones at some distance apart from him.

They knew that the time of his recovery from the depression that was upon his spirits would come; but they suspected it would be further distant from the cause of it than is usually the case even with the severest of mental shocks.

And Claude Duval was grateful to his two attached friends that they left him for a time alone with his sorrow, as he knew how incapable he was of conversing with them, and how totally inadequate all ordinary powers of consolation would be in his case.

Jack had already said all that could be said upon the subject.

CHAPTER CCCXVIII.

DUVAL AND HIS FRIENDS STOP THE PRINCESS SOPHIA ON WORMHOLT SCRUBS.

The night stole on, and a white mist rose up from the earth, and the stars, when the few rain clouds that had hovered in the sky about the hour of sunset had blown over, shone out sweetly and serenely.

At length midnight came.

Jack then whispered to Dick Turpin that it was time for them to move from that spot, and that, as Claude Duval had not yet spoken to them, it would be surely better to interrupt him in his gloomy meditations upon the past.

"Yes," said Dick, "I think so, too. You are by far his oldest friend, Jack, and I beg that you will go and speak to him."

"I will said Jack.

The place upon which Claude lay was protected by the overhanging boughs of a large tree, and Jack approached lightly.

"Claude," he said, "do you sleep?"

"No, Jack."

"Ah, you are better. You speak, now, more calmly and assuredly. You are better, are you not?"

"I am, Jack—much better."

"Thank Heaven! It gives me great pleasure to hear you say so, Claude. I suppose you have been thinking?"

"That is it, Jack. I have been thinking deeply; and although there will ever be a void in my heart by the death of Cicely—you hear that I can now speak calmly of that event—yet the result of my thought is, that she is far happier as she is than as if she still lived."

"To be sure, she is."

"I knew you would agree with me in that, Jack."

"Yes, of course, I will and do. I urged much the same thing upon you when first you got the sad news."

"Did you?"

"Yes; but you were, of course, too much engrossed by the fact itself, no doubt, to know exactly what it was I said to you."

"No doubt—no doubt. Where is Dick?"

"Close at hand, and he will be well pleased to hear that you think so properly of the past. Dick? Dick?"

"Yes," said Turpin, stepping towards them. "I am here."

"Claude has thought over his loss, and, like a wise man, he feels that it is inevitable, and that Cicely is happier far as she is than as if she had still to struggle with the world, and all its dangers and deep anxieties; and so, for the future, he will be himself again."

"Bravo!" said Dick. "That is right, Claude. It shows that you have sense as well as feeling."

"We will say no more about her," said Claude, wih a deep sigh. "She is gone, and may she be happy. Now, my friends, I am the same man whom you always knew; and, first and foremost, let me say that I know not how in the world I shall ever be able to express to you what a sense I have of all that you have both done for me in this matter of my escape from Newgate."

"Oh, pho!" said Dick; "it is nothing."

"Nothing at all," said Jack, "because, you see, in the first place, it was easily done; and in the second place, we knew that you would be quite willing to do as much for us at any time."

"In truth, I would."

"Very well, then, there is an end of that," said Dick Turpin. "You know, Claude, that such affairs are either tolerably easy, or impossible; and in this case, with all the arrangements we had been able to make beforehand, the affair was tolerably easy, and, as it turned out, was done quite nicely; and now here we are, all three on the road again, and ready, I presume, for any gift that fortune may throw in our path. Is it not so?"

"It is," said Jack.

"It is," said Claude. "Action will be my only course. I must strive to forget the past now, in the bustle and the changes of the present."

"That is the thing. All you have got to do is to prevent your mind from stagnating for want of something to do!" cried Dick; "and now let us at once put our former resolve into execution. It was to leave this part of the country, and to go westward, so if we are to do so to-night, let us start, or else in two hours time we shall have a young moon peeping up above the horizon, and if the sky keeps as clear as it is now, there will not be shadows enough to hide us as we go across the meadows."

"Be it so. I am ready."

"The horses have had a good rest, and as much food, in the shape of hay and grass," said Jack, "as they can eat."

"Hay, have they had?"

"Oh, bless you, yes, Claude. In the next meadow to this there are a couple of excellent stacks of prime meadow hay, so I have borrowed a few armsful of it for our steeds, and they have enjoyed it amazingly."

"Not a doubt—not a doubt."

The horses had had a rest of upwards of four hours, so that they were in capital condition for active service, and Jack undertook to lead the party across the country to the Edgeware Road, from which they could easily make their way westward.

By the dim, yet beautiful light of the stars, then, they all three set out, and

MAGGS RECEIVES INSTRUCTIONS FROM THE SHERIFF AND GOVEROR OF NEWGATE.

Jack went with great accuracy across the meadows. To be sure, now and then they came to rather a serious obstacle in the shape of a fence, which they found it impossible to get over, so they had either to make a gap in it, or go along it till they came to some gate which they could open; but this state of things was not very frequent, and by about half past one o'clock they all emerged into the Edgeware Road, about a couple of miles from Cucklewood.

They then held a consultation as to whether they should go on through the meadows instead, as before, by the high-roads; and as it was a time of night when they were not likely to meet any enemies, and they had got a considerable distance from the part of the country in which it would be believed they were, they decided upon keeping the road; so, at a trot which got over the ground pretty quickly, although without any appearance of hurry, they went on in the direction of Kilburn, which they soon reached.

The man at the turnpike came out in his nightcap to let them through the bar, and as he did so, he said—

"Gentlemen, you had better keep a good look-out, for there's a highwayman upon the road, they say."

"Ah, indeed?" said Dick. "Who is it?"

"That I can't tell you, sir; but they call him the Skeleton Horseman!"

"The Skeleton Horseman, do you say?"

"Yes, sir; that's what they call him."

"A strange title."

"Ah, sir, it is; but, for my part, I thinks as it is all gammon. I saw him once, and only once, and then he had a large cloak over him; so he just, to my thinking, looked, you see, sir, like any other christian."

"To be sure; thank you. Good-night."

"Here's your change, sir. It was half-a-crown you gave me, if you please, sir."

"Never mind: keep it."

"Well," said the turnpike man, as he went into his little house again, "that's a real gemman, now. How you may know a real gemman in a minute from one as isn't! Ah, it's a comfort to think as there is some real gemmen in the world yet as don't want the change out of half-a-crown from a poor fellow."

So much for gentility!

"This is an odd idea," said Jack, when they had got a little further on down the road, "to warn us of a highwayman, is it not, Dick?"

"Rather so."

"It is all nonsense, I daresay," said Claude; "but if we should chance to meet the fellow, I will put him to the test."

"Yes; and find out whether he belongs to this world or to another," said Dick, "for if—Hilloa!"

This exclamation of Dick's arose from the fact that, at that moment, the sharp crack of a pistol-shot came upon their ears, and then, right over a hedge, which was of considerable height on the road-side, whatever it was on the other, there came a man on horseback.

The leap was deep, and the horse went right upon his haunches for a moment after alighting in the road.

"Damnation!" said the horseman; but in another moment the horse was on his feet again, and he added—"Right—all right," and off he went, like the wind, country-ways.

"This is an odd start," said Dick Turpin. "Who the deuce is that, I wonder? Here comes some others, though."

"Stop him—stop him!" cried a voice from the other side of the hedge. "Stop thief—stop him, I say!"

"Hilloa!" cried Claude Duval. "What's the matter?"

"There he is—there he is!" shouted the voice again. "Over with you all, gentlemen, and we will have him."

With various degrees of success, now, four persons on horseback jumped over the hedge, and alighted in the road close to Claude Duval and his party, Claude and Dick both thought that their policy was to remain where they were. but Jack was of a different opinion. However, he gave in to the majority that were against him, and he, too, staid.

"What's the matter?" cried Claude again. "What is all this disturbance about?"

"Who are you?" said the voice.

"A magistrate," said Claude.

"Then, sir, you are the very person whom we wanted to get at, of all others, for you can decide what is to be done. We have pursued a highwayman across the fields for the space of two miles, and very much fear now that he has eluded us at last."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, sir. It seemed to us as if he jumped over the hedge."

"He did do so—or, rather; I should say, that a man on horseback did jump the hedge; but, of course, I have no evidence before me that he was a highwayman. If I had had such evidence, I and my friends would, of course, have at once stopped him."

"Plague take the evidence," said another of the mounted men. "I wish, sir, you had stopped him, and looked for the evidence afterwards."

"That would have been contrary to law, sir."

"Oh, perhaps it would; but if I come within pistol-shot of him I will have another try at his head, whether it is contrary to law or not."

"Of course, sir," said Claude, who kept up the character he had assumed with the most admirable gravity—"of course, sir, you will do what seems to you right, but you commit an act of that description entirely upon your own responsibility, let me tell you."

"I know that, sir."

"Very good. Perhaps you can tell me who this highwayman is?"

"That, indeed, we cannot, except that he is commonly called the Skeleton Horseman. He has only made his appearance during the last fortnight or so, and he has in that space of time succeeded in pretty well terrifying the whole of this neighbourhood. We very nearly caught him to-night."

"But why is he called the Skeleton Horseman?"

"Because they say that under the large cloak he wears, and which wraps him up from head to heel, he is nothing but a skeleton, and that he has shown himself to be such at times to people whom he has stopped upon the highway, and who have nearly fallen dead with fright at the sight of him. These gentlemen and myself were asked, if we could, to put an end to the delusion by catching the rascal; and, I am sorry to say, he has avoided us successfully."

"He went towards the country," said Claude; "but as soon as I get to London, I will send a party of horsemen on this road, with orders to take him, dead or alive."

"Much obliged, sir," said another of the gentlemen. "The rascal stopped my wife and her sister, and nearly frightened them both out of their lives; and my coachman, who was with the carriage, was so terrified, that he absconded from it, and ran off, and has never been heard of since."

"I will do my best to find him, gentlemen," said Claude; "and were it not that I am engaged just now on some very important business for the Secretary of State, I would turn my horse's head in the direction the fellow went, and try to hunt him up at once."

"Thank you, sir. Good-night."

"Good-night, gentlemen."

"Oh, by-the-bye," said one, "has anything been heard of Claude Duval, who escaped from Newgate, they say, last night?"

"He did escape, sir, and in the most audacious manner; and I can inform you that he is not captured yet, nor is there any likelihood that he will be either."

"Well, I don't see much good in Newgate if it can't hold a highwayman when it once gets him. Much obliged, sir, for your kindness; and so, good-night again."

The four gentlemen rode off along the road in the direction that the Skeleton Horseman had taken, and Claude Duval, with his two friends, jogged on in the opposite direction.

"You ought to be a magistrate, Claude," laughed Dick Turpin, "for, I must say, your tone and manner are quite magisterial."

"I hope not," said Claude. "But can either of you give a guess as to who this can be who is upon the road, in what we may call an opposition to us?"

"Not the least," said Dick.

"It's one of the new hands," said Jack, "I take it; don't you think so, Claude?"

"Probable enough. I cannot call to mind any one who would or who could successfully play such a part as this fellow assumes. It is a curious as well as a bold assumption, the character of death."

"It is; and I should like nothing better than to come across him," said Dick. "We may have that luck some of these days. It would be a good job if he were to stop us, would it not?"

"It would, indeed"

They now trotted on till they emerged at Tyburn Gate. They all three looked askance at the spot which had been the last look that many of their profession had taken of this world, and they did not exchange a word till they got to Shepherd's Bush, and turned down Wood Lane, which, at that time, led to Wormholt Scrubs, and may still, for all we know to the contrary.

It was just as they emerged from the lane on to the regular road that leads right across the Scrubs, that they saw, about half a mile off, a great flashing of lights, and by their movement, and the slight noise that came upon their ears, they felt certain a carriage was rapidly approaching them across the Scrubs.

"Who can that be, so well attended?" said Dick.

"Let's ride on and see," said Claude. "I don't know how you feel, my good friends, but I am rife and ready for any adventure."

CHAPTER CCCXIX.

THE PRINCESS SOPHIA THREATENS CLAUDE DUVAL AND HIS FRIENDS.

NEITHER Dick Turpin nor Jack felt that craving for occupation that now beset Claude Duval; but still they were far from being disinclined to follow him.

As regarded Duval, he knew that it was only by filling his mind with more cares and more perils that he could at all hope to banish from it the fearful remembrance of his loss; and therefore was it that, totally heedless of the consequences, he struck across the Scrubs in the direction of the advancing carriage.

Before he had gone far, though, reason came to the aid of Claude, and he began to feel how selfish and unfeeling a thing it was to drag his friends into enterprises that partly they might have declined, just because he fell in a despairing and a desperate frame of mind.

With this idea he drew up.

"Jack and Dick," he said, "pray pardon me."

"For what?"

"I assumed that you are both of you as sick of life as I am, and so off I came to meet the carriage, which seems to be well attended by mounted men. It by no means follows that, because I feel disposed to run myself into great danger, that both of you should feel so, likewise. My griefs make me selfish, but my reason has come to me in time; and so I beg of you both to use your own discretion and feeling in this matter, without consulting me at all."

"Don't speak in that way, Claude," said Jack. "Where you go we are willing to follow."

"But I have no pretensions to lead you"

"You have, if we like to admit them," said Dick Turpin; "but the fact is, there is no question of either leading or following. You feel disposed, Claude Duval, to stop that carriage, and I feel disposed to help you, and Jack feels disposed to help us both; so don't let us say another word about it, but come on to the enterprise at once."

"That's it," said Jack.

"On, then—on!"

"With me," said Jack. "if I might be so bold as to have my way in this matter, it would be anything but on."

"What would you do, Jack?"

"Wait for the carriage just at the corner of the lane, and then pounce upon it at once before it had fairly got into the lane. By that means, as the lane is narrow, one half of the escort will be in the way of the other half; whereas, upon the open Scrubs, if they have any judgment, they would, upon our making the attack, spread themselves around us, and in such a case I wouldn't give much for our chance."

"Jack is right," said Dick.

"He is," said Claude. "My judgment must have forsaken me when I left the secure corner of the lane to come out here into the open country. We will go back at once."

They all three turned, and galloped back to the lane. At the speed they made, it did not take them above three or four minutes to get there; for they had not got far upon the heath when Claude had pulled up to speak to his friends.

The carriage seemed to be coming on now at rather a slower pace than before, or they fancied it, because they were themselves no longer advancing towards it, and they could see that it was surrounded by some half-dozen mounted footmen, who carried links in their hands.

"Somebody of distinction," said Dick.

Jack was gazing earnestly in the direction of the carriage, and then he said, suddenly—

"Why, it's the royal livery!"

"Indeed?" said Dick.

"Surely not the king?" said Claude.

"Oh, no—no. There are no guards."

"But it is one of the royal family, I suppose?"

"Of that there can be no doubt," added Jack, "and it remains now to be decided what you both mean to do."

"Just what we would if it were any one else," said Dick.

"To be sure," said Claude.

"Well, but," interposed Jack, "to stop one of them will so exasperate the government against us, that it may do us more harm than good."

"Never you mind about the exasperation of the government," said Dick, "my dear fellow. We have nothing to hope or expect from the government but a rope when they can put it round our necks. The intense interest and excitement about our capture is so great, that if we were to stop the king himself, and rob him of his very coat, they could not do more than they are doing now."

"That is true," said Claude.

"They might increase the rewards very much," said Jack.

"And if they did," added Dick, "what then? The rewards for us, now, come to somewhere about a thousand pounds we will say. Do you think, Jack, my boy, that that sum is not quite enough to make the officers do their utmost to catch us?"

"Well, perhaps it is."

"And if it is, as we all know well that it is, I would ask you what more can people do than their utmost?"

"True—true."

"And, besides, my own opinion is, that the greater the reward offered for us the safer we are."

"The deuce we are!" said Jack.

"Yes, for this reason. The cupidity of the officers is so strongly awakened upon the subject that they get quite mad with jealousy at each other about it, and those who can't catch us throw every obstacle in the way of the others who have a little chance. Do you think that the officers are so fond of each other that they will put such a sum as a thousand pounds in each other's way?"

"No—no," said Jack.

Claude smiled.

"Are you converted, Jack," he said, "to the opinion that the higher the reward offered for us, the safer we are?"

"Upon my word, I don't know, but Dick Turpin puts it so clearly, that it sounds like the fact, whether it is or no, and I suppose there is something in it."

"A great deal," said Dick. "But the coach will be here in a few minutes, and so now we can have a good look at it."

The carriage that was rapidly advancing towards Wood-lane, with the evident intention of passing down it, and so emerging into the high-road, was a great lumbering vehicle, such as was considered highly fashionable and exquisite at that period.

It was quite large enough to hold eight people comfortably, and it was drawn by four long-tailed, heavy-looking Flemish horses, such as would not have disgraced a brewer's dray.

Upon the seat in front sat a great red-faced man, in a full wig, and three-cornered hat, and an immense scarlet coat. Two footmen in similar livery held on behind, and six mounted men with links trotted along, three on each side of the carriage.

These six men were in the royal livery; but they were by far too fat and bloated, with idleness and high living, to make any effectual resistance to an attack, although they were armed to the teeth.

Who were in the royal carriage could not, to Claude Duval and his friends, be even a matter of conjecture; for to conjecture at all about anything you must have some data to go upon, however insufficient, and in this case they had none at all.

It may be supposed, that with such cattle, and such a great, swaggering, lumbering load at their backs, the speed of the royal cortege was but slow; and such, indeed, was the fact, while every now and then, as the wheels encountered a rut or a hillock on the road, the vehicle swung about at such a rate, that it more clearly resembled a ship in a gale of wind than a carriage.

The route across Wormholt, or Wormwood Scrubs, as the tract of barren land bearing that name was differently called, was not very often used by people who had anything to lose, particularly at night; but it was a near way to and from a lodge that the royal family used, a mile or two out of town, so that it was well known that at times some members of that illustrious, by courtesy, race of German auxiliaries to the taxation of the country sometimes used the route.

But now, having given this brief description of the carriage and of the road that it was on, we return to the highwaymen, who were waiting its appearance upon the spot they had chosen for the encounter.

It will be observed that the three highwaymen had no less a number than nine men to encounter, including the coachman, and not including any one who might be in the carriage, and who might or might not be inclined to show fight upon the occasion.

This was rather long odds.

"I say, Jack," cried Turpin, "the four horses will give us the most trouble, if they begin kicking, so that let it be your task to release the two leaders, if you can."

"I will do it," said Jack. "A touch of a knife to the harness will soon set them at liberty."

"Good; and now what are we to do first, Claude?"

"I will call upon them to stop, and if they fire at us, we must fire at them; but I should say fire over their heads first, and if that don't make the fat lackeys fly, I know nothing of such folks."

"Very well—we will try it."

It so happened, that the bit of road exactly at the head of them, emerging into the open heath, was very soft and miry, so that upon reaching that part, the horses had rather a struggle to get the carriage on at all, and its rate of progress was very much decreased.

That was a very favourable circumstance for the attacking party.

As Jack had anticipated, the lane was much too narrow for the carriage and horsemen on each side of it to proceed in, as they had done on the Scrubs. That is to say, it was possible enough, if they had all been able to keep on a straight line, that they might have got along, but in the dark, and with four horses harnessed to the vehicle, and such a vehicle, too, no mortal coachman could have undertaken to say that he would keep the whole affair exactly in the middle of the lane.

The slightest deviation to the right would have pushed the horsemen into a ditch that was there, and the slightest deviation to the left would have jammed them up against a high bank.

It was not likely that the royal escort was going to place itself, for the whol length of Wood-lane, upon the horns of such a dilemma as that, so two o them went on before, and the other four kept behind, and on went the cortege

Claude waited till the horses and the carriage had fairly got into the lane, and so blocked out the four horsemen who were behind it, and then he sprung forward to the two who were in advance, and cried, in a loud voice—

"Hold!"

The horsemen pulled up, and the coachman tugged at the reins till he brought all the four carriage-horses to a stand.

"The slightest opposition," said Claude, "will involve the destruction, within the next five minutes, of every one of you."

A scream from the carriage immediately succeeded this announcement, and the coachman began lashing his horses. The two men in advance hastily fired their carbines, with which they were provided, at Claude, and then set off at full gallop, with a pistol-shot after them, that Claude discharged. Jack sprung upon the two leading horses of the carriage, and by a stroke or two of his knife released them from their harness, and off they went, lumbering along the lane, terrified at the banging of a cross bar against their haunches.

"Hilloa! What is it—what is it?" shouted the men who were behind the carriage.

"Murder!" bellowed the two footmen, and one of them scrambled on to the roof in his fright. The coachman sat with the reins in his hands, and his great red face turning of a purple hue.

"Fire at those fellows behind the coach," cried Claude; and Jack and Dick at once discharged their pistols, which had the effect of so terrifying the four mounted men that they turned round, and galloped across the Scrubs again as nard as they could go.

"Victory," said Claude, as he sprang from his horse, the bridle of which Jack took. "They are all gone now, and we will see who is in the carriage."

"Be careful, Claude," said Jack.

"Oh, yes—yes. It's all right."

Cluade Duval advanced to the door of the carriage, and at once opened it. He lifted his hat, and bowed, for there was no one there but a young woman, who, although fat, and coarse, and vulgar in her appearance, he had no doubt, from her features, and the richness of her dress, was one of the daughters of the king.

In fact, this was no other than the Princess Sophia, who was then in her nineteenth year.

"How dare you?" she cried, speaking with a lisp, as if her tongue were too large for her mouth. "How dare you, you wretch?"

"Madam," said Claude, "I have the honour to ask you who you are?"

"Help—help!" she cried.

"I really am not aware that anybody is meddling with you," said Claude. "Pray what is the matter with you?"

"I will have you hanged."

"Hark you, madam. I am a man of few words, and now I will trouble you for that watch you have just hidden under the cushion of the seat, and for that gold chain which is round your neck—for those rings that are upon your fingers, and which, I assure you, they don't become at all—and those diamond ear-rings, which make you look like some fat savage."

The reply to this, was a rather heavy vinaigrette being flung at Claude's head, and which narrowly missed him.

"Now let me beg of you," added Duval, "not to give way to your odious temper in this manner. If you are not quick in handing to me the articles I require, together with your purse, I shall be under the necessity of taking them."

"Wretch, do you know who I am?"

"No—but I can guess."

"Who, then, monster, am I?"

"Some kitchen wench, in the disguise of a princess, I suppose."

The rage of Her Royal Highness at this was so great, that she took the watch from under the seat of the coach, and flung it at Claude, and so she continued with the other articles he required, pelting him with them, one by one, to his great amusement; but the rings would not come off her fat, swollen fingers, and the ear-rings she did not attempt to remove from her ears.

Among other things, though, she had thrown him a well-filled purse, and a pocket-book; so that Duval was inclined to forego the rings and the ear-rings.

He was mightily amused, too, at the manner in which she had taken the attack upon her property.

CHAPTER CCCXX.

THE HIGHWAYMEN ARE IN GREAT DANGER; BUT SAVE THEMSELVES BY BOLDNESS.

Jack and Dick hearing the racket of the things being flung at Claude Duval, could not, for the life of them, make out what was being done, and Jack called out, at last—

"Claude, what is amiss?"

"Oh, nothing," said Claude. "Her Royal Highness is quite delighted to have fallen into such good company."

"No—I am not!" screamed the princess.

"But I say you are."

"But I am not!"

"Oh, then, if you are not, I shall make you come out of the coach at once, and kiss all my comrades, amounting to twenty-six men. Some of them have not been shaved for a week; but that don't matter."

"Oh, will nobody come and save me from this wretch? I will take care that all the police go after you to-morrow, and you will be hanged; for my father says that everybody ought to be hanged who takes anything that don't belong to them."

"Your father is a king," said Claude Duval; "but that does not prevent him from being an idiot, with strong passions and little mind, and so, as a natural result, vindictive and blood-thirsty."

"Take that!"

MAGGS AND DICK RESCUING CLAUDE FROM HIS CELL IN NEWGATE.

The only thing the princess had left to throw at Claude, was one of the cushions of the coach, and that she flung at him with such a vengeance, that it went right over the hedge.

Duval laughed.

"I assure you," he said, "that I have not been so amused for a very long time. Can you dance?"

"What is that to you, wretch?"

"Not a great deal. But as I feel disposed for a minuet, and as my friend, Sixteen-string Jack, can whistle the tune to perfection, I will trouble you, as I know you are disengaged, to favour me with your hand for a measure."

"I will die first!"

"Oh, no—you will not. I will take care that not only shall you not die, but that no harm comes to you. You are too amusing for that, by a great deal. Now, miss, pray alight, if you please."

"I won't!"

"Very good. Then I must help you to do so."

"Murder—murder! You shan't! Murder!"

Although Claude Duval handed the princess out of the coach in the gentlest manner in the world, she made such a racket, that Dick came up, and said—

"Hilloa, Claude! Can't you let the girl alone?"

"Take that," said the princess, dealing Dick such a box on the ears that his eyes flashed fire again.

"Thank you humbly," said Dick. "It serves me right for interfering. I might have expected it."

"Jack," called out Claude, "come and whistle us a minuet tune, old fellow, will you?"

"Allow me," said Dick; and in an excellent manner he commenced the tune, and Claude Duval, with much grace, began the dance. He took good care that he would not let go the hand of the princess, or, no doubt, she would have ran off; but he made her go through the figure of the dance, whether she would or not. To be sure, every now and then she gave him a cuff on the side of his head, or a blow over the shoulder; but he did not care a straw for such little pains, and, finally, he bestowed upon her lips a hearty kiss, as he said, in a laughing tone—

"You will not say that Claude Duval either lost his temper, or said or did a rude thing to-night, so far as you are concerned."

"Oh, then, you are Claude Duval, the highwayman, that is so much talked about?" said the princess, in a milder tone.

"I am."

"Did you stop the Duchess of Kingstown in the Edgeware-road, once?"

"I did."

"Well, then, I can tell you that she went out on purpose to be stopped by you; and she said you were the handsomest man, and the politest, she had seen for a long time,"

"I am very much beholden to the duchess," said Claude Duval, "and if I could only induce you to think the same I should be perfectly content."

"Oh, go along."

Claude laughed, and as he handed the princess into the carriage he kissed her again, which she seemed as if she had not noticed, for she did not make the slightest opposition or the least remark about it.

"Now," said Claude, "if there be anything among the articles you desire to have returned that you set any particular store by, only say so and it shall be at once returned to you."

"No, there is nothing."

"Then I have the honour of bidding you good evening, and of hoping that this little meeting has been productive, after all, of more amusement than alarm."

"I am not alarmed now, and—and I shall not say anything about it, so you will not be hanged."

"I am infinitely obliged."

Claude kissed her again, and then she added, in a low tone—

"You had better write to me if you get into prison, and they are going to hang you. I will do what I can to save you. You might be rude and you are not, which I feel grateful for."

Claude bowed, and closed the carriage-door. Then calling to the coachman, he said—

"You can go on now, the princess is ready."

"Eh? The Lord deliver us!" cried the coachman.

"Go on, I say."

"Our Father which art in——"

Claude fired a pistol just past the ear of the coachman, and that so startled him that he set his pair of horses that were still in the carriage to a trot, and then to a gollop, and the royal carriage was soon completely out of sight of Claude Duval and his two friends.

It was then that Claude burst into a prolonged fit of laughter, and when he could speak at all, he said—

"They are all alike—all alike—princesses or dairy maids—they are all alike!"

"What do you mean, Claude?" said Dick.

"Why, just this, that a little flattery—a kiss or two—a good figure, and a not so bad face, will do anything with any woman. The princess began with rage, and ended by almost devotion."

"You must not fancy that all are alike, though, Claude," said Jack "This female whom you just let go is probably rather more of an animal in her thoughts and feelings than many."

"Well, it may be so."

After all, what Claude Duval had gained by this adventure was very insignificant, considering the time that it had taken up; but it had had, at all events, the effect of withdrawing his thoughts from more painful subjects of contemplation, and that was much.

They all three went down the lane, now, back to the high road, and shaped their course towards Ealing.

Claude spoke hastily as though some painful thoughts had come across him that he was desirous of driving away, and he said, addressing his two companions—

"Let us make one of our old compacts, that is to say, let us agree to stop and rob the next six passengers, or vehicles, or horsemen, be they which they may, that pass along this road. Will you do so?"

"Willingly," said Dick.

"And you, Jack?"

"I'm agreeable," said Jack, "and after that I should advise that we go to the Old Hats Inn and put up for a little time."

"Agreed."

This was an old kind of agreement which the three had frequently made together, and which had at times been productive of a good deal of amusement if it had failed in the production of all its pecuniary results which they had looked to and hoped to derive from it.

"When they agreed, though, to this sort of thing, they did not exactly anticipate that the first object on the road that they, in accordance with that agreement, were bound to stop would be a mail-coach full of passengers, and well guarded by a man with a blunderbuss on the roof.

Such, however, was the fact.

Jack first heard the low reverberation of the wheels, and the steady tramp of the four horses, and turning to Claude and Dick, he said—

"I don't mean to say that we shall do so, but it is just possible that we may catch a tartar here, don't you think? It's a mail-coach."

"Never mind," said Dick, "they will pull up, and then it's all plain sailing enough. If they wanted to avoid such as we are, they ought to drive slap on at as good a pace as possible, and then we should find it no joke to stop them."

"They always do stop, though."

"Yes, the surprise of the moment makes them do so, and then they feel how hazardous it would be to go on again with a pistol bullet or two about their ears."

The mail-coach now came on at great speed, dashing along the road, and its lights flashing amid the trees and hedges, while the scarlet coat of the guard was plainly visible.

"Shall we, or shall we not?" said Jack.

"Yes," said Claude.

"Yes," said Dick.

Jack said no more, but prepared himself for action. A few moments sufficed for them to arrange what they should do. To Jack it fell to keep at the horses' heads, and hold the coachman in check—to Dick the task was assigned of holding the passengers generally, and the guard, in a kind of surveillance, while Claude Duval was to request the ladies and gentlemen who were inside the vehicle to give up their property of portable value.

The pace of the coach was rather great, so Claude Duval adopted a course to stop it, and called out, just as it was about to pass them at a swinging pace—

"A passenger! Hilloa! a passenger!"

"Ay, sir, yes!" shouted the coachman. "Wo-a! That's it."

The mail was stopped.

On the moment, then, Jack and Dick dashed forward, and the former, holding a pistol to the head of the coachman, cried out—

"Stir hand or foot, and you are a dead man."

"D——n!" cried the guard.

"Hilloa, you fellow with the blunderbuss there, you had better try to eat it than present it at us. We won't be trifled with!"

"Fire away!" said the guard, as he seized his blunderbuss. "I'm not going to be frightened, at all events, out of doing my duty. Fire away, if you mean to do it."

"No," said Dick, "I don't want bloodshed, if it can be avoided."

"I ain't so particular," said the guard, as he drew the trigger of the blunderbuss, and discharged the whole contents right at Dick Turpin.

"That's enough to blow him to atoms, horse and all," said one of the outside passengers.

"Rather," said the guard.

The report was terrific of the blunderbuss, and it created a complete cloud of smoke; but to the surprise of everybody when the smoke cleared away, there was Dick Turpin in exactly the same position he had before occupied, and he said in a calm tone of voice—

"If I were an angry man now, I should shoot you; but as you are a bold fellow I won't. Only don't be coming a second dose of that infernal machine this way, as it might hurt some one by accident."

"The devil!" said the guard.

"Well, I expected that," said a woman who sat on the top of the coach, "for you were paying so much attention to the young lass by me, when you loaded your blunderbuss, that you quite forgot you put nothing but powder in it."

"How do you know my good woman," said a passenger, "that he put nothing but powder in it? For a lady, you seem to be a wonderful judge of fire-arms."

"I am a soldier's wife," she replied.

"Oh," said the guard, "then that accounts for your knowing all about it. But I only wish you had told me, ma'am, at the time."

"You were otherwise employed."

"Oh, well, perhaps I was; but yet I would have blown that fellow, horse and all to the devil."

By the time this little confabulation had got to the point to which we have brought it, Claude Duval had reached the side of the coach, and placing the barrel of a pistol upon the ledge of the window, he said—

"Ladies and gentlemen, you need not be at all alarmed, as I shall not blow any one's brains out, unless they are provokingly slow in handing me their property."

A general scream from three ladies inside the coach followed this not over-pleasant command from Claude Duval. There were a few half-suppressed oaths from a gentleman, after which a voice said—

"Who are you?"

"Can you ask, sir?" said Claude. "Really, if you had only half a grain of sense, you might know who I was by my mode of address to you."

"Don't aggravate him," said an old lady.

"Oh, ma," said a young one, "I do think I shall faint right away."

"Let me beg you will not," said Claude, in a soft, low voice. "If you feel, however, a little faint, pray come out into the open air. It will revive you."

"Certainly not," said the old lady. "I don't want my daughter to get out of the coach because a highwayman asks her to do so."

"Money—watches—rings—pocket-books, and brooches!" said Claude Duval, as he rapped the barrel of the pistol against the ledge of the window.

"Oh, don't—don't," said the young lady. "I will not put up with this."

"What is the matter?" said Claude.

"He is trying to hide himself among our feet," she replied.

CHAPTER CCCXXI.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS MEET WITH AN ADVENTURE AT A FUNERAL.

"MURDER!" said a voice; "do you want to sacrifice my life? Oh, have mercy upon me!"

"Who is he?" said Claude.

"A young gentleman, Mr. Highwayman, if you please," said a lady's voice. "He has annoyed all the lady passengers of this coach, and now he is actually trying to hide from you under their—Hem!—I mean, about their feet."

"I'll have him out," said Claude.

Opening the coach door, Claude put his hand in, saying—

"Let me only get hold of him. Oh, this is his leg, I do think. Come, sir—come out, if you please."

"Help!—Fire!—Murder!" screamed a voice, as Claude dragged a rather diminutive specimen of humanity by the leg right out into the road.

"Pho!—pho!—pho! sir," said Duval. "I don't see what you need make such an uproar about. I am only showing you to an outside place, that is all."

"Oh—oh! Fire—fire!"

"Be quiet, sir. Who are you?"

"Margetts is my humble name, sir, I assure you. I am a professional man, too."

"What profession?" said Claude.

"He is a lawyer's clerk, Mr. H.," said another lady from the coach.

"Oh, is he? But what makes you call me Mr. H., ma lam?"

"I thought that more polite, sir, than calling you Mr. Highwayman."

Claude could not help laughing at this odd way of showing him respect and politeness; and then turning to the lawyer's clerk, he said—

"Now, sir, I shall trouble you to remain exactly where you are till I come back to you."

"Yes—oh, dear, yes!"

That learned individual was lying on his back in the road; and there, with a wholesome dread of what the vengeance of Duval might be inclined to inflict upon him if he stirred, he remained gazing upwards at the night sky, and fully expecting that the dreadful adventure would be sure to terminate in his melancholy decease.

Claude was at the coach door again in a moment; and then he found that the passengers were prepared to hand to him their valuables.

Duval never instituted any very scrutinising search to find whether they gave him all or not. He was satisfied that he got something worth his while; so he just took what was handed to him.

The young lady was crying, and Claude heard her.

"What is the matter, my dear?" he said. "Don't be frightened, I beg of you. There is no danger."

"It's my little watch, sir," she said. "My pa, who is now no more, gave it to me. I don't like to part with it."

"Keep it, by all means."

"But you have got it."

"Have I? Why didn't you keep it? Stop, though; if I have it, I will soon find it."

Claude hastily dived his hand in his pocket to look for the young lady's watch; and at the moment that he did so, he heard Dick Turpin call out—

"Warehawk!"

"Ah, what is amiss?" said Claude.

Turpin was by his side in a moment.

"Duval," he whispered, "there is a troop of light cavalry coming down the road. I heard the tramp of the horses' feet, and rode on a little, and met a man who told me that the Princess Sophia had been robbed, and they were sent from Bayswater barracks to apprehend three highwaymen who were upon the road, and of whom he begged me to be aware. I thanked him, and came back no quicker than I could to tell you."

"Does Jack know?"

"Yes, I have warned him."

"We must be off at once, then. But wait only a moment. I am looking for something."

"Look afterwards, Claude."

"No—no. Only a moment."

"All's right, Duval. We won't go without you, you may depend; but, still, for your own sake as well as for ours, let me tell you that there is no time to lose."

"I know it. Ah, here it is."

"What is it?"

"A little watch. My dear, here is your watch. I have great pleasure in returning it to you."

"Oh, thank you—thank you, sir. Will you take this little brooch as a gift from me for your kindness?"

"Certainly I will, and wear it, too."

"And take that as a gift from me," said the guard of the coach, as he snapped his blunderbuss again at Claude; but this time it didn't go off at all.

"D—n it," he said. "What is the matter with this confounded wretch of a blunderbuss?"

"Ah," said the soldier's wife, "you are a nice boy for a row, you are. I watched you well, and this time you put in no priming, though you did the loading part of the affair right enough."

"I'm an ass," said the guard.

"That's true," said the soldier's wife.

"What is all that about?" said Turpin. "I thought I heard the click of a gun-lock."

"It's nothing, sir," said the guard. "I was only looking at my blunderbuss, that's all, and feeling quite happy that when I fired it at you there was nothing but powder in it."

"You may congratulate yourself upon that fact," said Dick. "Are you ready now, Claude?"

"Quite."

"Off, then. Jack—Jack!"

"Here you are," cried Jack, as he rode up to them.

"Away!—away! We don't want a bout with the soldiers, if we can help it."

"By Jove, I hear them," said Claude.

They all three set off at full gallop, and as they had certainly the start of the troop of light cavalry that had been despatched with such expedition to lay hold of them, they did not at all despair of distancing them.

A very few minutes, indeed, brought Claude and his friends to Hanwell, through which village they dashed at speed, and then Jack called out—

"Listen, Claude. Your ears are younger than mine. Do you hear anything of these fellows?"

"No, Jack."

"Let's stop a moment," said Dick Turpin. "It is as well to know what we are about; and, for all we know, they may not be upon our track at all."

Upon this, they all three drew up, and for the space of about a minute, any one who could have seen them might have supposed them to be three statues of men on horseback, so perfectly still were both horses and riders during that space of time.

"Nothing," said Claude.

"Hark!" said Dick. "Don't say that."

"Ah, no—I don't say it now. I hear the clank of military accoutrements. Something is amiss."

"They are upon this road; but coming on with great caution. It seems to me that they have divided their force, and, in all probability, they are now in twos and threes, scouring the country all about this place."

"That is it. On—on!"

"Let us leave the high-road," said Jack. "About half-a-mile further on there is a little turning that leads on to the banks of the Brent river. We can jump it at that part, if it is not swollen by rains, and if it be, there will be no difficulty in swimming the horses across it. When we are on the other side we can get across the fields to some other road, and so baffle our pursuers."

"Granted. That we can," said Dick, "provided we cross the Brent, which is not so easy sometimes as it looks. But come on, we can but try."

They now trotted on, but by no means put their cattle to their utmost speed, for they wanted to reserve their power as much as possible; and as it was evident to them the soldiery were not attempting a vigorous pursuit, but were rather attempting to enclose them in a circle of scouts, they did not see any necessity for distressing themselves by hard galloping.

They soon reached the spot which Jack had mentioned as being pretty close to the bank of the Brent; but the sight of the little muddy river showed that it was much more swollen than they had thought it was likely to be.

Their experienced eyes told them in a moment that to attempt to jump it would be madness.

"It cannot be done with a leap," said Turpin. "The effect of such an attempt would only be to come with such force into the water a few feet from the opposite bank that, in all probability, the horse would stick in the mud, and not be able to extricate himself."

"Shall we try it a little higher up?" said Jack.

"If you like."

They pursued the bank of the little stream now for some distance; but just as they were about to make up their minds that if they were to cross it at all it must be by swimming the horses over, they heard the sudden clank of the military accoutrements very close at hand indeed, and a loud voice called out—

"Halt!"

"By Jove, they have stolen a march upon us," said Jack.

"Fire!" said the voice again.

They all three immediately stooped in their saddles till their heads were level with their horses' manes, and a rattling discharge of three or four carbines immediately ensued.

"All's right," cried Claude. "Nobody hit?"

"All's right," cheerfully answered Dick and Jack; and then Claude dashed at once into the water.

The others followed him at the moment, and they all three swam over the Brent, and landed on the other side just as the soldiers, who were three in number, and under the command of a corporal, reached the bank which they had left.

"Fire!" said the corporal again.

"It's our turn next," said Claude.

Simultaneously with the ringing discharge of the soldiers' carbines, Claude and his friends each fired a holster-pistol at their foes; and then, without waiting to see if they had done any damage or no, but quite satisfied with the fact that they were unhurt, they turned, and sped across the fields at a great pace, leaping a ditch and a couple of hedges that they came to in good style.

At the pace they were going at, it was not possible to hold anything like an animated conversation, and they each thought that they had nothing to do but to keep on at such speed and they would soon distance the soldiers, if, indeed, they were upon their track at all.

The best seeming calculation concerning the affairs of man is, however, at the mercy of some little cross accident, which may scatter all the results to the winds; and now it so happened that Claude Duval and his friends were the prey of one of those little accidental circumstances which alter the whole condition of affairs, and necessitate a totally contrary course of action to that which they thought of pursuing.

Jack's horse stepped into a hole in the ground and fell, throwing him partly over its shoulder, and then rolling on to him. The horse struggled to its feet again, and stood still, trembling; but Jack lay apparently dead, or insensible, upon the green turf.

Claude, who was a little in advance of Dick, did not see the accident; but Turpin did, and he called out—

"Duval—Duval!"

"Yes?" said Claude, looking round, at the same time that he slackened his pace. "What is it?"

"Jack is gone!"

"Good God!"

The impression of Claude Duval at that moment was, that Jack was shot; but then he recollected that he had heard no more firing; so he at once guessed the true state of affairs to be that his horse had fallen.

"It's the horse has done it," he said.

"Yes—yes. Poor Jack!"

Claude was soon at the spot, and hastily dismounting, and holding the bridle of his horse on his arm, he said—

"Jack—Jack! speak to me: are you hurt?"

"Where am I now?" said Jack, faintly.

"He is not killed, at all events," said Dick. "We must get him into the saddle again."

"Surely, yes," said Claude. "Hold my horse, Dick, while I do the best I can for him.

Dick Turpin held the horse, and Claude Duval lifted Jack from the ground.

"Come, Jack," he said, "how do you feel now?"

"What is it?" said Jack.

It was quite evident from the fall that his faculties were rather in a state of confusion.

THE FOUR FRIENDS WATCHING THEIR PURSUERS FROM THE HILL.

"Why, don't you recollect, Jack? We are running off from the soldiers. Rouse yourself up, if you can."

"Ah!" said Jack.

With this exclamation, he fell across Claude's arm like a dead weight, and it was evident that he had fainted. Claude was rather in a state of consternation to know what to be at.

CHAPTER CCCXXII.

THE MYSTERY OF THE RUINED MILL IN THE HAUNTED MEADOW.

"Put him on the horse," cried Dick. "You may depend he will be able to ride, and his brains will soon get clear again."

"But he has fainted," cried Claude.

"You don't mean that?"

"Indeed, but I do, though; and it strikes me that we are in a pretty considerable mess, now, Dick."

"We are, indeed. What the deuce is to be done?"

"Anything but desert Jack."

"Certainly. That I never thought of for a moment, I assure you; but it is none the less an awkward accident on that account."

"True—true, Dick. We must get to some place of shelter, and there wait till Jack has recovered. I hope that he is only shaken a little by the fall; but I fear that he is worse hurt than that. Do you know where we are?"

"Not very well. The fact is, Claude, this is not a part of the country that I have been much in, and the fields puzzle me, rather, and it is dark, too."

"Well, then, Dick, all we can do is to go right on. I will ask shelter and help for him at the first farm-house we come to."

"We can do nothing better, I suppose."

It was not a very easy matter to find a mode of carrying Jack, but at last they hit upon one which the docility of the horses only enabled them to carry out.

They placed Jack, insensible as he was, upon the saddle of his own horse, and then they rode one on each side of him and held him up, so that they went all three abreast, and at rather a slow pace, over the large meadow in which they were.

Both Claude and Dick listened with painful interest for any sound that might be indicative of the proximity of their pursuers, but there was none, and certainly, under the circumstances in which they were placed, that was an immense relief.

"If those fellows with their carbines were only at our backs now," said Dick, "they would not find it very difficult to make an end of our career."

"Indeed they would not, Dick. I fancy that just now we are about as helpless as we can very well be."

"We are, indeed."

Probably it was the jolting of the horse and the current of cold air that came across his face which had the effect of partially reviving Jack from the state of stupor into which he had fallen, but he suddenly heaved a deep sigh.

"Ah, Jack," said Claude, "you are coming round again. How are you, now, old friend?"

"Swim the stream," muttered Jack. "There—there—fly—fire!"

"What do you say?"

"Now—now, off again!"

"He is raving," said Dick.

"You may depend, then, the fall has given him a top on the head," said Claude, "for he has not spoken anything very rational since it took place. I'm afraid he is more hurt than is imagined."

Jack did not speak again for some few minutes, and then he said, in a faint voice—

"Claude, where are we now?"

There was something in the tone of his voice, now, which led Duval to think that his senses had really come back to him, and he replied—

"Why, Jack, we are in the fields. Do you recollect what happened to you awhile ago?"

"Oh, yes, I do now. The horse fell."

"All's right; you will do now, Jack. Well, are you hurt much? Can you feel any particular pain?"

"No—no, I—I am only shaken, I think. But I hardly know yet. Where are the soldiers?"

"Far enough off, I hope, by this time. Do you think you could ride without help, Jack, now?"

Even as he spoke to him, Claude felt that Jack swayed heavily against his arm, and as he did not reply it was pretty clear that he had lapsed again into insensibility, which was indeed the case.

"Poor fellow," said Claude, "it's of no use to plague him. He has gone off again."

"He must be seriously injured," said Dick. "But just look ahead, Claude, and tell me what you make of that black-looking object against the sky?"

"It's some building, I suppose."

"Yes, but it is in an odd place rather, in the middle of the field. Surely it can't be a homestead; and yet I don't know what else it ought to be."

"It's too high, and looks more like a tower than a house," said Claude. "It puzzles me, and that's a fact."

"Let us get towards it. We can go as cautiously as we like. I never saw so odd a building in the meadows before."

They now kept the dark-looking object well in view, and went rather carefully in the direction of it. After a little, Claude said, rapidly—

"Why, it's a mill!"

"A mill?" said Dick.

"Yes, to be sure. Look closely at it and you will see that it is. It is some old windmill, without a doubt."

"It is," said Dick. "The idea, now, that so familiar an object as that should not be at once recognised. Of course, it is a dilapidated mill. It is without arms, and that was what made it fail to suggest the idea to us."

"No doubt; but it's a pity Jack is not so far recovered that he might give us some information about it, for, without doubt, intimate as he is with all the suburbs of London, he would be able to tell us something concerning it."

"Call to him," said Dick. "Who knows but he may be able to speak to us again? and he is so used to your voice, that if he will reply at all it would be to such familiar tones."

"Jack! Jack!" said Claude. "Can you answer me, old friend?"

Jack made no reply.

"No, poor fellow, he can't."

"Very well, then let us get to the mill. It will afford us shelter, and him rest. What's that?"

A low muttering sound in the sky attracted their attention; and after continuing for a few moments, it broke into a thunder clap, and the very air seemed stilled and sultry.

"A storm is brewing," said Dick.

"Not a doubt of it. Ah!"

A flash of lightning so bewilderingly vivid at that moment lit up the scene, that Claude and Dick were glad to close their eyes, and the horses reared with fright, and began to plunge so, that it was with the greatest difficulty Dick and Claude together could hold up Jack in his saddle.

While that brilliant flash of light had lasted, though, they had had a capital view of the old mill and the surrounding country beneath its vivid powers.

Jack appeared now, by the lightning and the thunder, to be more thoroughly recovered than he had been, and cried out in a strange voice—

"The storm rages! the storm rages! Death will be the doom of all!"

"Peace, Jack, peace," said Claude, "there is no danger now. Be calm, I beg of you."

"Calm!" said Jack. "Oh, yes, I am very calm, indeed. I am so calm! When people are in the grave they must needs be calm, surely."

"He raves again," said Dick.

Another flash of lightning now lit up the scene. It was certainly not quite so vivid as had been the former one, but still it was of the same blue and forked character, and dazzled the eyes of the three highwaymen, although it did not have the effect of startling the horses quite so much as the former flash had done.

"Let us get to the mill," said Dick. "Better there than out here, exposed to the storm. Hark! That is indeed terribly like what we may call thunder."

"It is awful!" said Claude.

The clap of thunder that had, at the interval of about sixteen seconds only, followed the last flash of lightning, was truly grand. It commenced with a noise such as one might suppose would be made by the simultaneous discharge of a hundred pieces of heavy cannon, and the reverberations of the sound appeared really as though they would never cease.

By the time, however, that the last distant mutterings of the clap of thunder were dying away in the far-off horizon, the party had reached the old mill, and they now saw sufficient of it, even by the inefficient light that there was, to enable them to come to the conclusion that it was quite a ruin, and had been long since deserted, so far as any useful purpose was concerned.

"This is a miserable looking place," said Dick. "It looks as though such a storm as that which has just begun would scatter it to fragments."

"No doubt, Dick," said Claude, "it has weathered many such, though, and will weather many more. Hold Jack, while I dismount, if you please, Dick."

"I am better," said Jack, faintly.

"That's right. Can you sit without help?"

"I fear not."

Dick supported him, while Claude Duval dismounted, and then he helped him to the ground, but Jack was still too ill to stand without assistance, and Claude and Dick saw that any attempt to make him proceed at that time would be perfectly futile, and would most likely have the effect of forcing them in a short time to put up at some place much more inconvenient than the one they were now at.

After a brief consultation, they resolved upon entering the deserted mill; but they first of all looked out for some shelter for the horses, for a heavy drop or two of rain had fallen, and they fully expected that the storm would end in a fearful shower of hail or rain.

After some seeking, they found at a little distance from the old mill a shed, the roof of which was still in a tolerable state of preservation, and to that they led the three horses. After entering the hut, they found that there was a quantity of litter on the floor of it, consisting of straw, hay, dry leaves, and so on, so that it afforded every facility for keeping the horses comfortable for a short time, at all events.

The great object was to litter them in such a manner that if the storm should increase in violence so as to frighten them it might not have the effect of enabling them to escape; and this, with some trouble, Claude thought he had accomplished pretty well.

The result will show that in that expectation he was disappointed.

They had left Jack partially supported against the doorway of the old mill, but when they came back to him they found that he had sunk to the ground, and when they moved him he groaned heavily.

"Jack," said Claude, "I am quite convinced that you are hurt, and that it is something more than a shake that you have had from the fall off your horse."

"I fear so, too," he said.

"Are you in any pain?"

"Yes, great pain in my side. I fancy I have broke a rib or two."

"Not a doubt of it," said Dick, "and it is the pain that the broken ends of the bone give you when you are moved, Jack, that induces the faint feeling that has several times come over you."

"I don't think I have absolutely fainted," said Jack, "for when I felt quite incapable of speech or movement I still had a kind of idea of what was going on."

"There is no help for it, Jack," said Claude, "you must have rest."

"What place is this?"

"Why, it is an old, ruined, broken-down mill."

"A mill?"

"Yes, Jack."

"Is there a tall tree close to it, with a dead branch at the top of it?"

"There is a tall tree; but it is too dark to see the top of it, though the dead branch may be there for all we know to the contrary. Do you know this place, Jack?"

"I do. It is called the haunted meadow, and the old mill is supposed to be the resort of supernatural beings. No one will venture near it at night, and particularly during the prevalence of any storm; it is said to be haunted by the most horrible forms belonging to another world."

"Well," said Claude, laughing, "we have seen nothing in the shape of life, either of this world or another, except ourselves, yet, Jack."

"But you may."

Claude gave Dick a slight nudge with his elbow, as though he would have said—

"Do you hear how his old superstitious feelings cling to poor Jack?"

"Ah," said Dick. "But you don't mean to say, Jack, that you can believe in such stuff?"

"I don't know," said Jack.

Another flash of lightning now lit upon the old mill and the whole surrounding landscape with surpassing brilliancy, and this time the electric fluid appeared to spread itself out and to linger in the air, so that those who were by the entrance to the old mill could see quite clear for a short space of time the building and every object around it as plainly as if the sun of a summer's day had been shining.

"This is terrible," said Jack. "Why, there is a stream here. You did not tell me, Claude, that there was a stream here."

Duval was about to reply to him, but what he would have said was completely drowned in the clap of thunder that followed that vivid and beautiful lightning flash.

CHAPTER CCCXXIII.

THE SPECTRE FUNERAL TAKES PLACE IN THE OLD MILL.

Poor Jack was evidently very much put out of his way at the idea of being in the haunted mill during the continuance of a storm, and without waiting to hear what his friends would say, he spoke as soon as the reverberations of the thunder had sufficiently subsided so that his voice could be heard.

"Let us leave this place at once," he said; "oh, let us leave this place, I implore you both."

"We cannot, Jack."

"Why not? I am better—indeed, I am. Let me suffer what I may, I shall be content, so that I ride away from this place."

There was now a strange rushing noise in the air, and several very large hailstones fell upon the highwaymen.

"Here it comes," said Dick.

"Yes, and we shall catch the worst of the storm if we don't get some shelter," said Claude. "Come, Jack, let me help you to get under cover. I beg that you will make no objection, but that for our sakes, as well as for your own, you will avail yourself of the shelter of the mill,"

Jack said nothing. The appeal that Claude had made to him was one that he could not very well resist, notwithstanding his great and shuddering disinclination to enter a place that had so evil a reputation as that haunted mill.

It is no new thing to the reader, though, to find that poor Jack is infected by superstitious fears. The peculiar incidents of his career had given rise to the feeling, and he could not shake it off, do what he would.

It is a strange thing with regard to superstitious feelings such as those that beset poor Jack, that no experience will ever suffice to rid any one of them. It will be found that in no one instance has this fear been at all resisted by the result of any combination of circumstances; but still, when a new combination arises, the fears still remain.

Of course, if one proof in the shape of an absolute event could ever be brought forward, one would not wonder at the feeling of superstition gathering strength; but when that is impossible, it does seem strange that experience does not dissipate it.

Claude led Jack into the mill.

"How cold it is," said Duval.

"Yes," said Dick; "and the place smells as damp as the very grave. I fancy it has been a pretty considerable time since there was ever a fire in this building."

"Well, it shan't be much longer, then," said Claude, "for I will try if I can't light one somehow."

"No—no," said Jack. "Oh, don't!"

"But you will be as comfortable again, Jack."

"Oh, never mind me."

"But it is you that we do mind. You are hurt, and it's you and your comforts that we must attend to now; so don't say another word about it—a fire we will have. You have some phosphorus matches about you, Jack, now, have you not?"

"No. That is, I think not."

"Stuff; you mean yes. That is, you think you have."

"Perhaps I have."

"Jack—Jack, produce the matches."

Jack did so with a deep sigh, for he thought that the lighting a fire in the old mill argued the fact, that his two friends thought of making some stay in it, which he was most decidedly adverse to.

"Now, then," said Dick, "you collect what dry rubbish you can, Claude, and I will light a wax candle, and we will soon see what sort of a place we are in."

The bit of candle that Dick Turpin produced was soon lit, and after sheltering it from any adverse blast of wind with his hand for a few moments, until the flame had gathered strength, he held it up, and let its little rays illumine the old mill as well as possible.

They all three looked about them now with considerable curiosity, and even Jack appeared to forget some of his fears in the interest that the old place excited in him.

It was well worth the looking at, was the lower portion of that ancient structure.

The area of the inside of the mill was much larger than it appeared possible to be, looking at the building from the outside, and at one time it was evident that it had been fitted up with a much greater regard to personal comfort than such buildings usually were.

The walls were all panelled with oak, and the flooring was well laid down.

At one end there was a large fire-place, and some massive iron supports for billets of wood to be burnt upon.

The roof was one mass of heavy rafters, crossing and recrossing each other in all directions.

The place, too, was not wholly destitute of some rude articles of furniture, and, take it altogether, it certainly presented a very desirable refuge from such a storm as that which was raging without.

That the storm was raging, the three adventurers were put in mind by such a rattle of hail-stones, that it was impossible for some few minutes that they could have heard a word that either of them might have addressed to each other.

Such a fall of hail, however, could not possibly last very long, and it suddenly ceased as if by magic, and all was still.

"It is over now," said Jack, faintly.

Claude had placed Jack in a large, rough-looking, old-fashioned, wooden chair, by the side of the ample hearth, upon which hearth he had then a quantity of rubbish that he found about the floor of the old mill.

"Yes, Jack," he said, "it is over for the moment."

"It is over for good, Claude."

"Don't say that, Jack," replied Duval, who divined his motive, and knew that he wished at any sacrifice still to leave the place—"don't say that. It may begin again, and in my opinion it will, too."

Jack was about to say something in contradiction of this opinion, when, as if Claude Duval's words had been prophetic, down came the hail again with greater clamour and speed than before, and so much of it found its way down the old chimney, and bounced into the apartment, if it might be called such, in which they were, that Jack was silent, and Claude found that the task of lighting a fire was for the moment out of the question.

"This is hail, indeed," said Dick, as he took up a large mass of ice from the floor.

"It is," said Claude; "but the storm will, in reality, be over soon, I fancy, now. These hail-storms are generally brief enough, and the appearance of the hail is the end of the storm."

"Yes," said Jack, "and we can go then."

Claude made no answer to this; but taking the light from Dick, he placed it among the rubbish he had collected in the ample fire-place.

A dense-like smoke rose, and for a moment or two came out into the room, and half choked them.

"We shall be forced to go," said Jack.

The chimney in a few moments then began to do its duty, and the cold air being forced out of it, there was a strong and steady draught, and the smoke ascended at a great rate, and a bright flame rose from the mass of material upon the hearth.

"That will do," said Dick.

"Ah!" said Claude, "how cheerful a thing is a fire, after all! Now, Jack, only look about you, and own, old fellow, that we are infinitely better off here than in the murky meadows outside. The flame imparts quite an air of comfort even to the old place."

"But our pursuers," said Jack. "It would not be very comfortable to have them pop in all of a sudden."

"I agree with you there," said Dick; "and so, while you look after the fire, Claude, I will go out and take a good look about the place, as well as listen if I can hear any sound that may indicate the approach of the soldiers."

"They are off our track," said Claude; "so if they come here, it will be by accident only."

Dick went out; and then Claude said to Jack—

"Come, now, Jack, don't let Turpin think that you are the slave of every ridiculous superstition that you have ever heard of. For my credit's sake, as well as for your own, let me beg of you to make an effort to shake off such foolish fears."

"I will, Claude."

"You will? Well, then, if you will, it is as good as done; for superstition loses its power over us as soon as we have the courage to dispute it. It is like all other miseries, Jack, only powerful in so far as we choose to submit to it."

"I feel," said Jack, "that it is foolish to give way to such fancies; but as regards this place, there is, I assure you, a very fearful story told."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, Claude; and when Dick comes back, if he should report that all seems to be safe, I will let you know it."

"Do so, Jack; and here he comes. Well, Dick, how do you find affairs outside?"

"Up to your knees in wet and muck."

"And no news of our foes?"

"None, whatever. It strikes me very forcibly that they won't at all fancy taking to the meadows in the sweet condition they are in at present. The horses, too, are all right, and don't seem at all put out of the way by the hail-storm."

"Very good; and see how the fire burns."

"It is quite a cheering sight."

"Jack says he will tell me why this place is called the haunted mill."

"Drive on, then, Jack, and let us know all about it."

Dick brought himself a seat, of which there were several in the room, and Claude having likewise provided himself with one, they both looked at Jack to begin; but just as he was about to do so, Duval said—

"How about the broken ribs, though, Jack? It's too bad to set a fellow to story telling in such a state."

"Why," said Jack, "I am inclined to think that after all it is only a sprain, for it is better, and I can use my arm, at all events, more freely; but there is a deuce of a lump on the side of my head."

"That was what confused your faculties a little, Jack."

"No doubt of it."

"Well, the story—the story," said Dick.

"You must know, then," said Jack, "that a murder has been committed in the mill. The fields all round this spot, and the mill, and a large mansion that is not far off, all belonged to a family named Wingrove. There were two sons of the proprietor of the place, and when he died he left all to the younger of the two, to the exclusion of the elder; but if the elder should survive the younger, the property was to go to him, as the old man said that if such should happen he hoped the elder would have acquired wisdom and virtue by years, which he did not then possess."

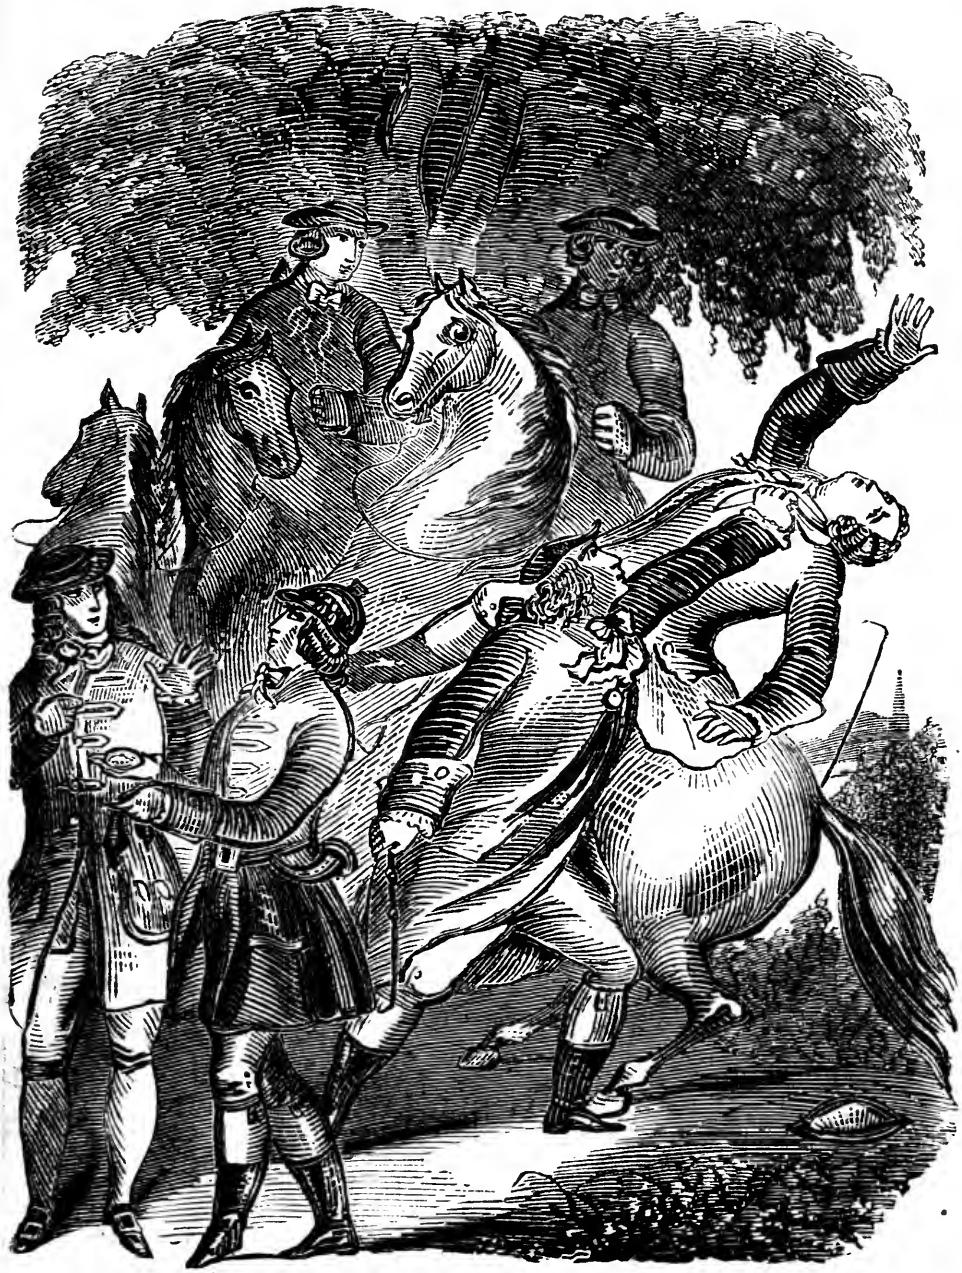
"Rather harsh, that," said Dick.

"It was, and it appeared that the elder son was in some foreign land, but hearing that his father was dead, he came to England and sent a letter to his younger brother to visit him here at this mill, for he set forth in the letter that he had committed acts that made it impossible he could show himself publicly in this country.

"Well, they met in the mill, and the elder murdered the younger in the upper floor of this very building, and cast the body down a trap-door in the ceiling."

"A trap-door in the ceiling? I wonder if it is really here still," said Claude, rising.

"Don't look for it," said Jack.



"Oh, why not? Stuff and nonsense, Jack. Why not? If I really find it, I shall place much more reliance upon your story, and if I don't I shall place none at all upon it."

Claude got a lighted brand from the fire, and held it up towards the ceiling, until at last he cried—

"Here it is."

"Well, then," said Jack, "I hope you are satisfied, that's all."

"I am so far."

DICK TURPIN CHASTISES MR. MILLS FOR ATTEMPTING TO SHOOT HIM.

A strange howling noise was now heard, as if from the upper chambers of the mill, and then there was a lumbering sound just above the very trap-door of which Jack had so recently made mention.

"What the deuce is that?" said Claude.

Dick and Jack had both risen; but the latter did not feel himself well enough to take any active part in what might ensue; so he sank back again into his chair with a deep groan.

The noise had entirely ceased; but that something had taken place in one of the upper chambers of the mill there could be no doubt; for as they had all heard the noise, if could not be by any possibility ascribed merely to imagination.

"Go on with your story, Jack," said Claude.

"Perhaps I had better not," said Jack, faintly.

"Oh, nonsense! Let us know it all."

"Well, the elder brother buried the younger under the floor of this part of the mill; but as he was taking his way to the house after the deed of blood, and fancying that all would be his, there came on a storm, and he was struck dead by the lightning."

"Serve him right."

"He was buried here in the grave he had made for his brother, whose remains were removed to the family vault; but the ashes of the murderer moulder beneath this flooring, and the funeral took place at the dead of the night, being attended by some of the old servants of the family, and since then the mill is haunted by the ghosts of both the brothers, and once a year by the spectre funeral."

CHAPTER CCCXXIV.

THE SOLDIERS FIND THE MILL TOO HOT TO HOLD THEM.

"THE spectre funeral!" said Duval; "what sort of a ghost can that be, Jack?"

"Ah," said Dick Turpin, "I should like to know. I have heard of many ghosts; but the ghost of a funeral cortege must be something rare. I wonder how the ghost of a coffin looks?"

"You may laugh as you like," said Jack, mournfully; "but it is a fact, I assure you."

"What is a fact?"

"Why, that on the evening of the murder at midnight the spectres of all who buried the dead body of the murderer here appear, and go through precisely the same ceremony then, that they did originally; for they say that his spirit cannot rest, as it lies in unconsecrated ground, and that those who buried him can have no peace till some clergyman comes upon one of the anniversaries, and reads the burial service over the old bones that lie beneath our feet."

"Oh—oh!" said both Claude and Turpin, "you do not really and truly, now, Jack, expect us to swallow that?"

"You can believe it not, as you please," said Jack. "I only tell it to you as it was told to me, and I always thought it rather a fearful story. I don't feel well enough to contend with your unbelief; but I do think that even if you were to see the spectre funeral, you would not believe it, then."

"You are quite right, Jack."

"Oh, then, don't ask me to tell you anything else."

"Yes, we will, Jack; but we need not believe it for all that, you know."

"Hark!" said Turpin. "What is that?"

Three distinct knocks came upon the floor of the apartment above that which they were in, and then a strange, smothered scream burst upon the night air.

"There, there," said Jack. "I knew it—I knew it. Oh, let us get away from this place. I tell you it is haunted, and it cannot be a good thing for a living man to mingle with the spirits of the dead. Come away—oh, come! Ah, I—fear I cannot."

Jack made an effort to rise from the chair upon which he was sitting; but he sank back in it again on the moment, for the hurts he had received from the fall of his horse so disabled him, that he was in anything but a fit state to carry out his own advice to fly from that haunted mill.

All was still again in the upper part of the mill.

"Claude," said Turpin, in a tone which showed how deeply his curiosity was excited, "what do you really think is the meaning of all this noise above here?"

"He cannot tell you," said Jack, rather pettishly.

"Well, I think I can. Some one or more persons are there, and they think they have a better right to the old mill than we have, and so they want to get rid of us."

"Oh, no—no."

"Yes, Jack, that is it, old friend; but they won't succeed while such a night as this is outside, I can tell them."

The same kind of noise now sounded from above; only now instead of the three knocks succeeding as though they were all upon the trap-door, they appeared to go over the floor, and to be in three very different parts of it.

Jack groaned aloud.

"Oh," he said, "I would not be here on the night when the spectre funeral appears for a trifle."

"What night is it, Jack?" said Turpin. "I might feel inclined to come just to see the sight."

"The third of August," said Jack.

"What?"

"The third of August."

"Why, Jack, do you know what you are saying, old fellow? This is the third of August! Why, you will forget your own name next, Jack. Don't you know that this is the very date you mention? Why, Jack—Jack, you are having a joke with us."

"It's no joke to him," said Claude. "I think he has fainted. I will raise a flame in the fire."

By giving the fire rather a vigorous stir, Claude Duval succeeded in getting up a flame in it, by the aid of which he saw that Jack was looking very pale, but had not absolutely fainted.

"Why, Jack," he cried, "rouse yourself from this torpid condition. I never knew you so completely overcome by superstitious fears before. Come—come, old fellow, laugh it off."

"The very day!" said Jack, faintly. "There is some fatality in this."

"Ha! ha! Well, what then, Jack?"

"What, then, do you ask, Claude Duval? I dread to think what then! I dread to ask myself the question."

"I don't, then. Do you, Dick?"

"Not I."

Jack raised his hand.

"There," he said—"there again. Do you hear that, both of you?"

"What?—what?"

"A voice singing. I hear it. Don't make me think that I am mad, and that I hear things that you do not. There it comes again. It is a voice singing something in a low, wailing accent."

"I do hear it," said Claude.

"And so do I," said Dick Turpin. "The noise gets louder, too, each moment. There it comes again. Where the deuce is it?"

"Hush!—hush!"

From a very low, weak voice that could scarcely be heard, the tones of some one singing a plaintive air became quite clearly perceptible, and in a few minutes more, although they were all rather at a loss to say whether the voice came from above or below, or from some room upon the same level with the one they were in, they could all three plainly hear even the words of the song, if song that strangely chanted melody could be called.

Those words were as follows: —

"The blood of a brother
Will seek not to rest
When shed by the hand
That should shield the loved breast.
The cheek that is pale
From the guilt of the heart,
Will never know peace
Till the world shall depart—
Till time is no more—
Till the seas cease to roar—
Till sunk is the shore,
And the world to its core
Crumbles into the dust."

Three frightful shrieks concluded or put a stop to this strange rhapsody, which, towards the latter part of it, was articulated in a most singular fashion.

"Help!—help!" said Jack.

"What's the matter?"

"Oh, I know not; but I feel—as if I were choking in this place. For the love of Heaven, let us go. Let us go, I say! What is the time? Is it near to midnight? I tell you both that the spectre funeral will be here to-night, as sure as we are living men!"

"Stuff! Be quiet, Jack."

"I cannot. I implore you to go from this place."

"Jack," said Claude, "there are several reasons why we cannot comply with your request, and one of them is, that to do so would be to give way to superstitious fears, which neither Turpin nor I feel at all inclined to do."

"Certainly not," said Turpin.

"But you cannot fight against facts, Claude."

"No; but I don't see the facts yet."

"Those noises—those terrible shrieks, and that unearthly singing. What call you all that?"

"Nothing more, Jack, than I could do myself at a veay few moments' notice, if there was any occas on so to do; but if Turpin is of my mind, he will take good care not to leave this place without some sort of solution of the mysteries connected with it."

"I am of that way of thinking," said Turpin, "and am quite willing to accompany you, Claude, in a search through the old mill."

"Come, then, I don't suppose that our foes, the soldiers, are likely to trouble us here, so suppose we try to discover what we can of the secrets of this place."

"And what am I to do?" said Jack.

"If you think yourself unsafe, Jack, we will not leave you; but I must confess I see no cause for such a feeling upon your part."

"Nor I," said Turpin. "Besides, of course, if we are in the mill we shall be near enough to you, Jack, to hear you if you see occasion to give any alarm."

"Go—go!"

"Take him at his word," whispered Turpin to Claude Duval. "He must be cured, if possible, of these strange fancies that possess him, and which really have the effect of warping his judgment and making his life quite miserable."

"Yes, I would do anything to give his imagination a different turn, but I much fear that it is too late to do so."

Poor Jack now looked at them both with a gloomy kind of intent as they made the preparations to get to the upper part of the old mill. A very brief examination assured them that there had been in one corner of the rather large apartment in which they were a staircase, or rather a set of open steps leading to the upper rooms of the building, but they were there no longer, so that there did not appear to be any mode of reaching the rooms above, except through the trap-door in the ceiling.

"That will be our way," said Claude, pointing to it.

"Assuredly," said Dick Turpin.

Jack merely held up his hands and gave his head a slight toss, as much as to say—"Can it be possible that they are mad enough to put their heads through that trap-door." They observed him, but they took no notice of his rather expressive pantomime in disapprobation of their course.

Claude dragged a table under the trap-door, and then mounted it. As he did so, a deep hollow voice of the most unearthly cadences, suddenly said—

"Beware!"

"Eh?" said Claude. "What?"

"Beware!"

"Oh, thank you. I mean to keep a good look-out, and to take all the care of myself I can."

"Beware!"

"That will do. I heard you say that before."

"Oh!" cried Jack, "this is truly terrible. Three times he has been told to beware! and he treats the warning with the most shameful levity. Claude—Claude, the beings of another world will not be trifled with in such a manner."

"I beg your pardon, Jack, but I really think that I have more grounds of complaint than they have. They are trifling with me, for they keep telling me to beware! but they do not have the kindness to say what of."

Jack shut his eyes. He was truly shocked at the mode in which Claude Duval spoke of the supernatural world, and he would not encourage him by saying another word.

Claude nodded to Turpin, and then said—

"See that your pistols are in order, and follow me, Dick. We will, at all events, place ourselves in a position to form a clearer opinion of affairs in this place than we can do now. Follow me as closely as you can, Dick."

CHAPTER CCCXXV.

THE MYSTERIES OF THE HAUNTED MILL ARE RATHER ON THE INCREASE.

By standing on the table which he had placed in the middle of the room, Claude Duval found that he was of sufficient height to command the trap-door easily.

Dick Turpin sprang up on to the table by his side.

"Is it open, Claude?"

"Not yet, I am trying it."

The trap-door appeared to be quite fast, and situated as Claude Duval was, of course he could not bring much force to bear against it, so that a trifling fastening on the other side would have the effect of holding it tolerably closely down.

"We must get something to force it with," said Claude.

"Suppose you tried a pistol-shot through it."

"I don't like to do that, for, after all, we don't know who may be on the other side, and a chance shot if it hits any one, generally hits the wrong one."

"Well, there is truth in that. But I will get one of those spare pieces of wood that are in yonder corner behind where Jack is now sitting, and by its aid we shall soon succeed in forcing the trap-door.

"Do so—do so."

Dick Turpin jumped off the table to get the piece of wood he spoke of, and then there came the mysterious taps from above upon the trap-door.

"That will do," said Claude, "I hear you."

"Rash mortal," said a void, "once more beware. Desist from this wild attempt to penetrate the mysteries of beings that are not of this world. Mortal, be warned, and depart in peace."

"Thank you," said Claude, "for the caution; but I feel quite a curiosity to have a look at you, and as I do not come to you with any mischievous intent, I really don't see what you can have to complain of."

"Oh! oh!" said Jack.

"D—n it!" cried Claude, suddenly, "what is that?"

He sprang from the table, and then they all saw descending from various little crevices round the trap-door small globules of blue light, each one of which as it fell shot up from the table into a little flame of brilliant blue.

A loud yell then came from above, and Jack sprang up from his chair as though he had not been hurt at all, and shouted out—

"There—there is one of them!"

"One of what?" said Claude.

Jack gave the fire a plunging kick with his heavy riding-boot, which made it shoot up into a flame again, and then they all three saw reaching down from the trap-door, which was opened about six inches to allow of it passing, a hand and arm, but a perfect skeleton.

There were the long bony fingers, and the double bone of the fore arm, yellow with the marks of decay. Not a particle of flesh was upon that arm.

"Clutch me," said a voice, "and come to the dead."

The hand waved to and fro as if seeking for some one whom it might lay hold of below.

Now, without being superstitious at all, any one might be rather surprised at such a little incident as this, and it was no wonder then that both Claude Duval and Dick Turpin continued to look at the strange sight before them without getting upon the table again.

Dick appeared to be the most thoroughly astounded of the two; and the hand, after making as it appeared several ineffectual grasps to try and get hold of somebody, was withdrawn, and the blue lights went out.

Claude drew a long breath, and then he said—

"Dick, old friend, what is your opinion of all this?"

"I have," said Dick, as he sneezed terrifically, "a very powerful opinion regarding the blue lights. They owed their origin to brimstone, I can swear."

"I thought I smelt brimstone."

"You only thought you did? Oh, well, it is possible that some current o air sets this way, and so brings the greatest quantity of it to my nose; but I doubt if I shall smell anything else for a week to come."

"But the hand, Dick—the skeleton hand? What do you think of that?"

"Ah—what!" groanad Jack.

"Why, nothing."

"Nothing can come of nothing, Dick. You do not think it was anything supernatural?"

"I think it was a real skeleton hand, but I suspect that there was no skeleton body attached to it. Nothing could be very well easier than to probe a skeleton hand and arm through the trap-door, and to wave it about."

"That is true."

"But a mere supposition," groaned Jack.

Claude Duval appeared for a moment or two buried in thought, and then he said, sharply—

"I will not give way to this delusion—I will not leave this place with even the doubt upon my mind concerning the character of these sights and sounds. I will know that they are explainable by natural and human means, or I will further have grounds for believing that they belong to the supernatural."

"Oh, Claude, you don't know your danger," said Jack. "What if the supernatural beings who may be above in this mill do you an injury?"

"I don't believe they can, even if there be such. Things that have no substance cannot injure my body surely; and as for my soul, they cannot harm it—

'Being a thing immortal as themselves,' as the man in the play says; and, therefore, I will not hesitate."

Claude Duval now set about making his way through the trap-door, and certainly by so doing he displayed an amount of courage which very few in his situation in that ill-omened and ill-reputed place could possibly have commanded.

Dick had already provided himself with rather a thick piece of the trunk of a tree, and Claude Duval now took it from him and sprang upon the table again. With such an example before his eyes, Dick Turpin did not scruple to follow at once.

Claude then spoke in a loud voice—

"Hark you!" he cried. "I address you who are above there. We are well armed, and upon the slightest attempt to attack us or to do us any injury, we are likely to retaliate in a way that will be more energetic than pleasant."

All was still.

"I may add, too," said Claude, after the pause of a moment or two. "I may add, if it be of any importance to you to know that much, that we are in no way connected with the constabulary or the law."

Still no reply.

"Now for it, then," said Claude.

The piece of wood made a most powerful kind of battering-ram even in the awkward position in which Duval stood to use it; and after the third blow with it upon the trap-door it burst open with a crash.

"All's right," said Claude.

"I have my pistols ready," said Dick.

Claude did not think that anything was to be gained by delay, so he caught hold of the sides of the trap-door and drew his head and shoulders through the opening into the upper apartment of the mill.

"A light, Jack!" cried Dick. "There is a bit of wax candle. Light it, and hand it up to me, here."

Certainly the state of affairs was now such as might well have aroused every latent feeling of superstition that might be in the minds of Claude Duval and Dick Turpin.

It is not in human nature to entirely divest itself of such a feeling; and an imagination that would be free of all such sensations would be a phenomenon such as the world has not yet ever seen.

Jack lit the piece of wax candle that Dick Turpin threw to him, and held it up towards the trap-door.

"Take this, Claude," said Turpin. "I suppose it is dark enough up there, is it not?"

"As pitch," said Claude.

"Oh, come down," said Jack.

"Not just yet. Rather, do you come up."

"I will," said Turpin, and he scrambled up in the same way that Claude Duval had done.

"Hold the light higher, Claude."

"Yes—yes. Oh, God! what is that? Look, Dick, look! What do you make of it, eh?"

They both crouched down by the trap-door, and at about twenty paces from them they saw by the dim light that the piece of wax candle gave them a tall figure in a dark-coloured kind of mantle, standing in the middle of the floor, and regarding them both with a fixed and stony gaze.

It was impossible that any one could look at the face of that figure for a moment and believe that it was human.

"There is more in this than I thought," said Claude. "Dick! what—what is it?"

"By heavens I know not."

"I will speak to it. What are you? Speak if you can, and dare do so."

All was still.

Claude drew a pistol from his pocket, and levelling it at the figure, he cried out—

"I swear by my life that if you do not give some token of who and what you are, I will fire!"

The figure did not move, and Claude fired direct at its chest.

The concussion of air put the little light out, but there stood the figure as it had stood before, with a strange blueish kind of halo of light about it, as if it extended from its surface.

"It is not human," said Dick.

The figure vanished.

"A light—a light!" cried Dick. "We must not be in the dark here!"

"Hilloa—hilloa!" cried Jack from below. "Claude—Claude! Dick, I say, Dick!"

"It is the voice of Jack," said Claude. "Something has happened below. What is it, Jack?"

"The soldiers!"

"The what?"

"The soldiers are close at hand. I have been to the outside of the mill. It is coming down it torrents, and they are coming rapidly across the meadow, in this direction. They are certain to take shelter here, and we are lost."

"Not so; you must come up here, Jack."

"But—but—"

"Hang it, this is no time for buts. As yet, if that be what you want to know, we have seen nothing more than ourselves up in this loft, so don't hesitate, old friend, I beg of you."

Jack, notwithstanding all his superstitious fears, could not help feeling that his only safety from the clear and tangible dangers below, was by scrambling as well as he could through the trap-door. This he succeeded in doing pretty well, with Duval's assistance; and that he did so without putting himself to much inconvenience, was a pretty good proof that, however he might have been shaken by the fall of his horse, no bones were broken.

It was very satisfactory to Claude Duval to see Jack better.

CHAPTER CCCXXVI.

THE SOLDIERS ARRIVE AT THE MILL, AND JUST MISS THE HIGHWAYMEN.

THE rain had, some short time before the period when Jack had called up through the trap-door to let his friends know that the soldiers were at hand, ceased in a great measure, and the friends had been led to believe that the most of the rain was over.

That belief, however, turned out to be completely fallacious; and in so desperate a climate for changes as ours, it is no wonder at all that it did so.

He would need be a bold man who in England would take upon himself to say what the weather was about to be, from what it appeared at any moment.

Now the rattle of the shower upon the top of the old mill made such a racket, that although Claude Duval and his two friends were yet one story removed from it, they could hardly for a few moments hear each other speak for the tumult.

That state of things, however, did not last very long, for although it still rained very fiercely, the water came down in smaller particles, and did not strike so forcibly against the building.

"Oh, but the trap-door," said Jack; "shut it at once, or we shall be seen by the soldiers."

THE ATTACK OF THE OFFICERS UPON THE BARRICADE.

"Are you sure now, Jack, that they are really coming?"

"I saw them."

"Well, that is proof positive, and down goes the trap-door."

"Stay," said Dick Turpin. "It will be a very easy thing to leave it open just so far as to enable us to hear what is going on below, and yet not so far that it can be supposed to be otherwise than shut. Allow me, Claude. That will do it."

Dick placed a little piece of wood that he found in the mill-loft in such a position that it held open the trap-door to the extent of about half an inch, which was quite sufficient for the purpose of reconnoitring through, or listening to the occurrences below, but yet was so narrow an opening, that by looking from the room beneath upwards it was quite out of the question that it should be observed.

All was now complete darkness in the loft, with the exception of an occasional fitful gleam of light, that made its way through the small space that the trap-door was open when a flame would shoot up in the fire that they had kindled below.

"Oh, Claude," said Jack in an agitated whisper, "you have seen something here, although you will not tell me that you have. Is it not so? Tell me truly, I beg of you."

"We have."

"I knew it! I knew it. Ha!"

"There it is again," said Dick.

The same figure that they had before seen, and which was evidently proof against a pistol bullet, now presented itself to their notice, at the farther end of the old loft.

Jack sank down almost to the floor with terror, and his teeth chattered in his head, as he gazed at the awful spectacle. Claude and Dick, too, began to think that it must indeed be some being of another world, however unwilling they were to yield to such a fancy.

"Past! past! past!" said a deep, hollow voice.

Then there came one of the strange and terrible screams, such as they had before heard with feelings of alarm, and the figure vanished.

"Oh, Heaven!" exclaimed Jack, "save our reason. It is said, that it is not possible for aught human to look upon a being of another world, and still preserve that reason which belongs to the inhabitants of this earth; and now that we have looked upon such a spectre, we shall go mad—mad!"

"I beg your pardon Jack," said Claude. "You may go mad—mad, if you like; but I don't intend to do any such thing, nor I don't think Dick will join with you in such an intention."

"Certainly not," said Dick.

"Hush!" said Claude. "Here is some tangible danger at last. Jack was right about the soldiers. The soldiers are at the door of the mill."

"There is a light here, my men," said a voice below. "We may find some one who can give us shelter till the weather clears a little. March!"

The tramp of feet in the lower part of the mill now proclaimed the fact that the soldiers who were in pursuit of the highwaymen were there, and then a little sharp voice cried out—

"It's quite clear to me, Mr. Sergeant, that the rascals cannot be veay far off; and I hope you will resume the search for them as soon as this pelting rain is over."

"Plague take them!" said the sergeant.

"So say I," resumed the voice; "but as I am a professional man, I assure you, Mr. Sergeant, upon my reputation, that you could not possibly in anywise, notwithstanding, do a more acceptable service to society as aforesaid than by catching these thieves."

"Ah, you are a lawyer, Mr. White," said the sergeant, "and it's all in the way of your business; but we don't like it."

"There's no one here," said the corporal, who had attentively examined the room; "but there wouldn't be a fire unless some one had been here recently. It's a shelter, at all events."

Claude peeped through the small opening in the trap-door, and he saw the soldiers below, and a little meagre-faced man dressed in black, and whose clothes shone very much with the rain, who he rightly conjectured to be the Mr. White mentioned by the sergeant a few moments before.

The soldiers were drying their accoutrements by the fire, and swearing dreadfully at the duty they were upon.

"We must get out of this," whispered Dick.

"Yes, but how?" said Claude.

"Well, I don't know just yet; but there is one proposition that I think will be pretty evident, and that is, that if we do not make the mill too hot to hold the soldiers, they will make it too hot to hold us."

"True enough; but yet I own that I am rather puzzled to know what to be at. Where is Jack?"

"Here," said Jack, faintly. "It has gone."

"He can think of nothing but that ghost," said Dick, "It is of no use to say anything to him, Claude. What are they doing below now? They are making a great noise."

"They are breaking up the old chairs and tables, and heaping them on to the fire. They don't seem very particular about how they get up a good blaze, I must confess. I wonder Mr. White's professsonal feelings are not outraged by such proceedings."

One would almost have thought that the attorney, for such he evidently was, had heard Claude, for he said at once—

"You will excuse me, I am sure, in what I am going to say to you; but I cannot help remarking that this conduct is very illegal—I may say, strikingly illegal—Hem!"

"What conduct, Mr. White?" said the sergeant.

"What conduct? Why, the breaking up of people's furniture to feed a fire. I can assure you that an action could be opened, and you, as the defaulters, would find that you had no defence."

"Stuff!" said the sergeant.

The fire blazed freely in the old chimney of the mill; and then Dick Turpin whispered to Claude Duval—

"I say, Claude, I have thought of a plan, if we could only manage to carry it out, which would make the stay of these fellows below in the mill as short as possible."

"What is it?"

"If we could only stop the draught of the chimney, they would soon be half smothered. I can smell the odour of wet straw which they are now heaping on to the fire-place."

"It might be tried. There is one other story above this, and if we could get there, there would be do great difficulty in reaching the top of the mill, surely. It is worth making the effort."

"It is, surely What are they about, now, Claude?"

"Ah, one of them has lit a torch, and they are are proceeding to make a careful examination of the mill. If we are to do anything like what you have suggested, it ought to be done at once."

At this moment a tremendous uproar ensued in the lower part of the mill, and the soldiers who were clustered round the fire all started up on the moment, and ran to where they had piled their firelocks. The fire was nearly extinguished, and the apartment was filled with smoke and soot. A large portion of the wall just abore the fire-place feel right out with a crash, and the greatest confusion prevailed in the place.

The mill appeared to be shaken to its foundations.

"What on earth is all that?" said Dick.

"God only knows," said Claude, as he hastily withdrew the piece of wood that had held the trap-door a little way open and let it close cautiously.

"Don't do that, Claude," said Dick, "we can neither hear nor see now. Open the trap again."

"We shall be smothered by smoke and soot if we do. It was coming up this way in dense volumes. Wait a little until it has cleared somewhat, and then I will open the trap again."

Notwithstanding that the trap-door was shut, they could hear tolerably distinctly the noise of the soldiers below. The little cracked tones of Mr. White, too, came pretty plainly to their ears.

"Oh, dear—oh, dear!" he cried. "What is all this about? What is taking place, now, I should like to know? The blessed mill is certainly falling down, and no mistake."

For a few moments even Claude and Dick, who neither of them lost their presence of mind, were rather at a loss to account for the sudden noise and confusion that had occurred; but Dick, after a few moments' consideration, said—

"Claude, that was an explosion of gunpowder, I feel quite certain. There can be no mistake about it now; I smell it quite plainly."

The state of affairs was now anything but very pleasant to any of the parties in the old mill. That some gunpowder had, by some means, been lodged in the chimney, and had suddenly exploded by the aid of the large fire that the soldiers made with the chairs and tables, appeared to be a proposition concerning which there could be no doubt.

The unmistakable smell of exploded powder pervaded the whole structure.

Such an odour was not likely to escape the practised noses of the soldiers; and after the first surprise had gone off, the sergeant cried out—

"Why, it's powder, my men. We have hit upon a mine. I suppose we shall be all blown to Jericho soon if we don't look out."

The men seized their muskets and mechanically formed in line; but as there was no appearance of any enemy, they could only look at each other with inquiring eyes by the light of one of the links they had with them, and which had withstood the concussion of air caused by the explosion.

After all, the principal part of the concussion had expended its fury up the ample chimney of the old mill, or, no doubt, it would have done some very serious damage to those who were assembled in the room so immediately contagious to the scene of it.

Mr. White, though, the attorney, who was with the soldiers, and who had been compelled to accompany them by a magistrate to whom he acted in the capacity of clerk, was in the most abject state of fear, now, and considered that his life was scarcely worth a moments purchase under the then exciting state of things.

"Oh, goodness gracious!" he said, "do come away out of this place. It's only a question between fire and water, and if you don't prefer the latter, I don't know what you can possibly be thinking about. Oh, come—come, my good fellows; isn't it better by far to be carried up outside than to be blown up inside?"

"It's all over," said the sergeant.

"Oh—oh! is it? You don't say so?"

"Yes, I think it is, by Jove!"

"Then, good-bye," said Mr. White, who by the words "It's all over" of the sergeant thought he meant that there was no hope for them in this world; and as he knew that, being a lawyer, there was no hope for him in the next, he gave himself up quite to despair, and fell flat on his back in a corner of the room on a great heap of damp straw.

CHAPTER CCCXXVII.

THE SPECTRE FUNERAL ACTUALLY MAKES ITS APPEARANCE.

If the situation of himself and friends had not been quite so critical as it was, Claude would have been rather amused than otherwise at the abject fears of Mr. White; but he felt that he had other things to attend to of more importance than the ludicrous agitation of the attorney.

After what had happened, it was quite clear that the soldiers would not be content to sit down so quietly in the place as they were before. The sergeant soon confirmed such an opinion.

"My lads," he said, "this little bit of an explosion has done no harm, as it happens, to any of us; but it shows us that there is something else in the place but old tables and chairs and rats—gunpowder don't get into a chimney without hands; and it is just possible we may find something worth looking for if we bestir ourselves, for we ought not to forget that we are promised fifty pounds among us if we bring in the highwaymen, dead or alive."

The soldiers expressed their assent to this proposition, and Mr. White, looking faintly up, said—

"What was that you said about fifty pounds, sergeant? If there is any money going, don't forget me, Abraham White, Esq., an attorney of the Courts of Westminster."

"Go to the devil!" said the sergeant.

"Oh, I feel that I am going there," sighed Mr. White, as he sank back again upon the wet straw.

"My lads," added the sergeant, "in such an affair as this, I know you will do best without precise orders when you know what you have to do; and so, I say, search the mill right through, and let us see if we cannot find these gunpowder gentlemen."

"Ah, we will have them!" said the soldiers.

"Hold!" said a deep, hollow voice, that was of such tremendous violence as regarded sound, that it might have come from a giant of awful proportions.

Claude and Dick both started, and looked around them, but all was quiet and solemnly dark in the loft, and yet the sound seemed wonderfully close at hand. As for the soldiers, they all paused, and remained in precisely the same attitudes in which the sound had caught them, as though it had had the faculty of turning them suddenly to stone.

Mr. White pulled some of the wet straw right over his face, and kicked convulsively; for now, indeed, he thought that his time was surely come, and that Old Nick himself had taken the trouble to fetch him.

"Hold!" said the voice again, and then it died away in rumbling echoes through the old mill.

"The devil!" said the sergeant.

"That's it," groaned Mr. White.

The soldiers handled their muskets, and looked now at each other with doubt. Each one sought to gather from the face of his neighbour some explanation of the strange sound that had seemed to come from no mortal lips.

"Sergeant," said the corporal, "what do you take that to be?"

"Some trick of the enemy," said the sergeant, as he drew his sword, "and I don't intend to let it scare me from the mill. I am only the more convinced that we shall not have come here in vain, though it was accident that led us to this place."

"Very well," said the corporal. "I'm willing and ready for anything."

"Will you all follow me?"

"We will, sergeant," said the men—"we will."

"Come on, then."

The sergeant turned round three or four times, now, and seemed rather puzzled to know where to lead the men to, now that he had got their consent to follow him. He seemed rather to have assumed than been at all really aware that there was any mode of leaving that apartment of the mill except the one by which they had entered it, and which led out into the open air again, and that was not where they wanted to go.

"Hilloa!" he said, "I don't see any way up stairs."

"Nor I, either," said the corporal.

"The deuce take it!"

Mr. White groaned and kicked again, as he murmured—

"They are speaking about him again. I heard him say something about the deuce. I'm an undone lawyer!"

"Let's have a good look about the place with the aid of the link," added the corporal. "There is surely some way of getting to the upper story of the mill."

The link was held high up, and then several of them saw the trap-door at once, and the corporal cried out—

"Here's the way. There's a door in the ceiling, and it isn't very high; so we shall easily enough get up to it."

"Come on, then," said the sergeant. "On with you, my lads, as quick as you can."

Now, Claude and his friends heard all this quite plainly, and they felt that it was time for them to make some sort of movement in the matter, if they did not want to come into actual collision with the soldiers, which they certainly did not.

"This won't do," said Dick. "This place will be too hot to hold us in a little time, Claude."

"Yes, we must get out of it; but how I really know not. You must light your wax tapers, Dick, and see if there is any ladder or trap-door into the loft above."

"Yes, that is it."

Dick lit a taper, and held it up as high as he could; and then in one remote corner they saw a something hanging from the ceiling; but it did not look like a ladder.

"There is something," said Dick. "Come on."

"No," said Jack, suddenly laying his hand upon Dick's arm. "The soldiers will be here through the trap-door before we can determine what to do. I can hear them, now, piling up furniture, so as to get up to it; and if they had not so wantonly knocked to pieces the table by the aid of which we got here, they might have been with us by this time; but they have used that for fire-wood."

"What is to be done?" said Claude. "We have no means of making the trap fast, that I can see. If it had now but a couple of good bolts, it would give them some little trouble; but, as it is, we cannot hold it down."

"Yes, we can," said Jack. "I will soon show you how. You and Dick can hold down the trap, while I go and look for some means of leaving this place, if such are to be found."

As he spoke, Jack came to a pile of wood, that was in one corner of the loft, and returned with a long flat piece, which he laid over the trap-door. It extended some three feet over it on each side.

"Now, Claude," he said, "do you stand on one end of this piece of timber, and you, Dick, on the other; and I will then defy any force that they have below to move the trap."

"Good," said Claude, as he stood upon one end of the piece of wood. "I rather think you are right enough there, Jack. The pressure they will have to contend against will be immense."

Dick took possession of the other end of the timber, so that the trap-door was held down by a power equal to their united weights—and they were neither of them very light men. The piece of timber was quite thick enough to put any doubt of its being broken quite of the question.

They could hear the soldiers making of the broken furniture below some sort of platform to stand upon, to open the trap-door from; and the sergeant called out—

"Now, my lads, I think that will do. Up with you."

There was a general scrambling, and then the corporal called out—

"It's as fast as a rock."

"The devil it is!"

"I knew it!" said Mr. White. "He says, 'The devil it is!' Oh! oh!"

The soldiers paid not the slightest attention to the condition of Mr. White, nor to anything he said or did. They were too intent upon the work they had set themselves.

"It can but be bolted above," said the sergeant. "A blow with the butt of a musket will open it."

Bang! bang! came two heavy blows with the brass-bound butt of one of the muskets. But, although the trap-door creaked and shivered, it did not open.

"Why, it's got a house a top of it," said the corporal.

"Shall I send a bullet through it?" said one of the men.

"Ah, do."

Bang! went the musket, and crack through the trap-door came the bullet, and lodged in the ceiling of the loft.

Dick and Claude did not utter a word; but they looked rather anxiously for the return of Jack, to tell them if he had found any means of reaching the upper floor of the mill. It was just after the musket-shot had been fired, that Jack came back. He spoke in a whisper—

"Come," he said, "there is a rope hanging from the edge of an opening in yonder corner, that leads to a small oddly shaped loft above. There is no difficulty in getting up."

"All's right."

"Stop," said Dick; "if we leave this place they will open the trap."

"No. They will rest contented with the ascertained fact that it is too fast to move. Let us go."

Dick and Claude stealthily stepped off the piece of timber, and followed Jack to the corner of the loft, where the rope hung.

"It is quite fast and strong," said Jack. "I have been up."

"That will do. We will follow you."

"No—no; I will follow you both."

"This is no time to dispute about precedence," said Claude, as he laid hold of the rope, and with great quickness drew himself up into a very curiously shaped little chamber—a loft at the very top of the mill. Dick followed him; and then came Jack, who drew up the rope after him, and cut it from the iron hook to which it had been securely fastened.

The soldiers were now in deep consultation as to the best mode of forcing open the trap-door, which they thought to be so fast, but which in reality would now have opened with a touch.

It was quite ridiculous to think how they must be eyeing it, and shaking their heads, and wondering what held it so powerfully, for no bolts could have resisted the attack they had made upon it.

"Now for a light, again, Dick," said Claude, "that we may see where we are. It seems an odd place, rather."

Dick re-illumined one of the little bits of wax candle that he had with him, and then they saw the loft that they were in. The sides of it were nothing but what is called weather-boarding; and the top was the centre of the mill. Some sliding panels of wood at the sides, something in shape like the port-holes of a ship, let in air; and when Jack opened one of them, he found that it let in a great deal more than air, for he was nearly smothered by a terrible quantity of smoke, that came puffing into the loft.

A little examination let them see that the top of a chimney was just at that spot; and as the fire in the lower room was the only one in the mill, they could come to no other conclusion than that the chimney before them was the one communicating with it.

Jack shut the sliding shutter quickly enough, and Dick opened one opposite to it, which soon let out the choking vapour that the other had let in, owing to the wind being in that quarter. The rain was still coming down.

Indeed, what had appeared to be a mere storm and which would have been expected to be soon over, now seemed to have altered its character, for the night was as black as pitch, and the rain came down with such a steady pelt that it promised continuance for an unlimited period of time.

Yet they all three were glad to lean out at the port-hole, if it may be called such, in the wall of that uppermost story of the mill, and breathe the cool fresh air, which, loaded with moisture as it was, was yet very refreshing and invigorating to them.

The soldiers, in the meantime, were not idle.

By the advice of the corporal, four of them brought their muskets to bear upon the trap-door in the ceiling all at once, and they gave it such a blow, thinking that it was of course as fast as it was before, that when it suddenly yielded, as it of course did, and flew open, they all four outstretched themselves, and down they fell off the tables and chairs they had piled up on to the floor of the lower room.

"Murder!" cried Mr. White.

"What's the matter, now?" said the sergeant.

The coporal, who was one of the four who had fallen, sat up and rubbed his head, as he said—

"The devil's in the trap-door! Why, it yielded this time to a touch, and flew right away as if it had never been fastened at all. I can't make it out."

The others who had come down with such a crash looked at each other rather ruefully, and felt anything but composed by the circumstance.

CHAPTER CCCXXVIII.

THE CONFEDERATES MAKE THEIR ESCAPE FROM THE HAUNTED MILL.

Claude Duval and his two friends, in the uppermost story of the old haunted mill, heard that something had gone rather amiss with their foes upon the basement by the noise that had come upon their ears; but what it was that was so much amiss they had no means of exactly coming at.

"You may depend that they have had a fall," said Dick Turpin, "or they would not make all that noise."

"No doubt of it," said Jack, "and I only wish it had been from the top of the mill to the bottom of it, for then they would get rather sick of the job of hunting us in the way they are now doing."

"We will sicken them," said Claude, "in a quicker, but yet, I doubt not, quite as effectual a way, as if they had the fall you talk of, Jack."

"How so, Claude? I can't exactly see how you are to get at them from here."

"Then I will show you, Jack. In the first place, I think that with a very little trouble we might get out of one of these openings—or windows, I suppose we may from courtesy call them—and get right on to the top of the old building. When there, I don't think it is at all likely they will see us, or even suspect that we are there."

"Well, that will do for one thing; but if they take a fancy to stay till daylight in the room below, why, then, I fancy they will be able to see us."

"That I don't at all intend to let them do, unless they are more independent of ordinary comforts than I think they are. What do you say to smoking them out?"

"Smoking them out?"

"Yes, Jack. There is the chimney top, within arms-length of us; and it strikes me that if we stop it up, the smoke will make its way anywhere but up here; and that the soldiers will find it not the most pleasant sort of atmosphere to breathe in. What do you say?"

"Do it."

"And you, Dick?"

"Anything to annoy the enemy. If they are at all prudent, even, they will go after such a smother as they will soon find themselves in. Let us now set about it."

THE BURIAL OF BEN, THE PUBLICAN.

They commenced looking about the old loft of the mill to see if they could find anything that would answer the purpose of stopping the chimney; and after awhile, Dick said in a cheerful voice—

"Here are the means all capitally at hand. Now, I have lit upon a heap of old corn sacks. They are so damp by lying long here, that they quite stick together, and are as mouldering as it is possible to conceive them to be. They are the very thing."

"Hush!" said Jack; "I hear our enemies in the room below this. Be careful how you move and speak."

They all three listened now attentively, and they heard the voice of the sergeant say—

"Come on, my men. There is nobody here. Come on. You must have loosened the trap before, and that was what made it give way so easily now. Up with you."

"They come," said Dick. "Quick, Claude! Open the casement opposite to the chimney top, and I will lower the sacks into it. Quick! quick!"

Claude opened the shutter that closed the opening by the chimney, and a puff of horribly thick smoke from the wet straw that the soldiers had imprudently flung on the fire, came in their faces.

Dick held his breath for a moment or two, and then he thrust one of the sacks into the chimney; but it disappeared.

"D—n it!" said Dick; "that's gone down."

"All the better, Dick. It will carry with it a capital dose of soot and smoke. Place another over the top."

"It is done. Fuff! what a smother! Ah! it is clearing off from us, now. I will warrant that no more of the smoke will get out this way."

A current of clear cold air set now in at the open casement, and it was very grateful to the senses of Jack, and Dick, and Claude, after the terrible smother of smoke that they had had to endure for the few moments before.

The effect upon the soldiers of sending all the smoke into the mill, instead of up the chimney, now had to be waited for; but it was quite out of the question that many minutes must elapse before it took place.

The next object that Claude and his friends had was to follow up their plan of operations, and get out at the top of the mill, so that when the topmost loft should be searched, they should not be found.

It was not a very easy thing to do in the dark, but yet there were many places for the foot to get a firm hold, and for the hands to gripe; and if there had been but a gleam of light sufficient to enable them to see what they were about, they would have found the task to turn more easy.

As it was, however, there was no time to think of difficulties, and they set about it with right good will.

They all three felt that their only chance of safety lay in the fact that the soldiers did not know they were there, however their sergeant might suspect such a thing to be possible. If they were once seen, of course there would be no hope of escape, for the soldiers would set about their destruction or their capture in such a professional manner, that one or the other of such contingencies would be certain.

"Let me go first," said Claude. "I am a pretty good hand at climbing, and I will take the rope with me that we cut away from the iron hook at the entrance to this loft. I may possibly find some place to fasten it to, so that it will be of the greatest possible assistance to you both."

"Do so, Claude," said Turpin, "and be quick, whatever you do."

Thus urged, not that indeed he wanted any urging at all in the matter, Claude Duval got out of the window on the opposite side to where the chimney was situated; and then he found, the moment he got on the outside, that there was a rude kind of railing there, by the aid of which it was an easy enough matter to reach the top of the mill, where there was a flat space of about eight feet square, likewise protected by a railing.

"Dick! Dick!" he said.

"Yes, Claude?"

"You and Jack can come up at once; it's as safe as anything can possibly be. Indeed, it is a little too safe, for our foes may take it into their heads to have a look here."

Dick followed Claude, and Jack came after him, so that in a few moments, without any danger at all, they were on the top of the mill; and as their eyes got accustomed to the dim night light, they could see with what facility the post which they had chosen might be reached, and they felt that if there was to be a real search of the building, they had hardly bettered their position by getting where they now were.

"This won't do," said Claude.

"Not at all," said Dick. "If they choose to come after us, why they can; and when they can find us they have nothing to do but to go down below and pop at us with their muskets till they hit, or until we give in and let them take us."

"That they shall not," said Claude,

"Stop a bit," said Jack, "It is that bit of railing that makes it so easy to get up here."

"It is."

"Then I will put an end to that pretty quickly. It is as rotten as it can be, and I thought it would have given way with me."

As he spoke, Jack sat down on the extreme verge of the roof of the mill, and when in this position, he could just with the heel of his boot reach one of the principal supports of the railing.

"Now," he said, "one kick and it is gone."

"Do it," said Dick.

Jack gave the kick, and the railing, although it did not go, only hung on by a small portion of the fastening. The weight of a cat would have sent it down in one mass.

"Hush! Jack," said Claude, "that noise will betray us. Don't do that again, you can't think how that will sound in the mill. Be quiet, whatever you do."

"I did not think of that," said Jack. "I will not touch it again, but it will be no help to any one, for woe be to him who trusts to it."

"Come back, Jack," said Turpin, in a low voice. "I can hear the soldiers in the loft quite plainly."

They now all three crouched down on the top of the mill, so that they could not have been seen against the night clouds, and they watched the course of events with no small degree of interest.

Upon the occurrences of the next ten minutes hung the question to them of life and death—for capture was death, and escape only was life.

The soldiers, in the meantime, had recovered from the panic that the fall from the trap-door had occasioned them, and had followed the sergeant into the room above; but there, although they brought a lighted link with them, they found no traces of the men whom they sought.

The sergeant called to the attorney—

"Mr. White—Mr. White, I say."

"Yes, if you please," groaned the attorney, "I am here. Don't put me in a very hot place, I beg of you."

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, dear, good Mr. Devil, you know what I mean well enough. I mean that I am a professional man, if you please—I mean that. Oh, dear, have the goodness to spare my feelings. If I can give you any advice at any time I'm sure I should be most happy, my dear sir. I am not absolutely on the grill, now, in a manner of speaking, but I am quite warm enough, I beg to assure you, sir."

"The fellow is mad," said the sergeant.

"He thinks," said the corporal, "that it's all up with him, and that he has gone down below to a certain old gentleman's dominions, and nothing will root it out of his head."

"Then let him be where he is."

"Yes, it's the best thing."

"Now, my men," said the sergeant, "I don't mean to go so far as to say that those rascals we are looking for are in the mill, but that there are some persons here, I think, we have heard enough to feel pretty well convinced, and, at all events, we will search it. Hold the light higher, and let us look about us."

The soldier who carried the link held it high up above his head, and it cast a livid and uncertain glare over the whole chamber.

That room was of the same size as the one below it, for it was not until the building got higher than that that it began to taper towards the top. One of the walls, however, was off the perpendicular considerably, so that it seemed as if that side of the mill were built very much inwards.

"There's nothing here," said the corporal, as shading his eyes with his hand from the too great glare of the link, he looked carefully about him.

A deep, hollow groan, coming as if from some one actually in the room, now filled up the pause immediately succeeding the corporal's brief remark.

They all started.

"What is that?" said the sergeant.

"None of us," said the soldier with the link. "The groan seemed to come from over in yonder corner."

The sergeant drew his sword, and stepped boldly forward, and made a thrust at the wall.

"Now, you cowardly rascals," he said, "come out, if you are hiding here anywhere—come out and show yourselves, and don't be trying any of your mountebank tricks upon us."

A shriek of terrible laughter rang through the place, and the soldiers looked at each other with dismay, while he who held the link stepped two steps towards the trap-door, as though he meditated making his escape from the place.

"Halt!" said the sergeant.

The men all stood perfectly still.

"Why, my men," he then added, "you are not quite so foolish, surely, as to believe that there is anything supernatural in this mill, I hope? All these are but tricks to scare us from our pursuit."

The corporal coughed and whiped his eyes, and the men began to breathe with difficulty, and then one of them said—

"Why, the place is filling with smoke as fast as it can. I am half choked."

CHAPTER CCCXXIX.

CLAUDE DUVAL MAKES MR. WHITE VERY USEFUL IN AN EMERGENCY.

THE effect of the stoppage of the chimney was now beginning to be but too apparent to those who had to endure it. The atmosphere was becoming impregnated with dense volumes of smoke, that not only impeded the breath by its acrimonious nature, but affected the eyes of the soldiers very sensibly.

Mr. White, who still lay upon his back in the room below, escaped much of the effects of the smoke that was now coming out of the fire-place in volleys, because it had a tendency, of course, to ascend, and the open trap-door acted almost like a flue, in drawing it up to the loft.

"What the deuce is all this?" said the sergeant coughing, and holding a handkerchief to his mouth. "Is the mill on fire?"

"I shouldn't at all wonder," said the corporal. "That explosion of powder in the chimney, I daresay, has done it."

"Ah, no doubt—no doubt. Run down and see what it is."

The corporal hastily went to the trap-door, but when he tried to descend by it, he was met by such volumes of dense smoke, that he found it impossible to get through there, and he was half smothered in the attempt to do so.

The soldiers were all coughing.

"It's coming in faster than ever," said one.

"Let it out," said the sergeant, and he took a musket from one of the men, and commenced hammering away at one of the walls of the mill. Several of the soldiers followed his example at the same spot, and they soon broke a hole in the side of that loft, through which the smoke forced itself in a dense volume.

This had the effect of relieving them a little, for a regular current now set in from the trap-door to the hole in the wall, and that carried by far the greater portion of the smoke with it. The sergeant pointed to the opening in the roof leading to the upper story, and cried out—

"We must get up this way now, and I suppose that is as high as we can get."

"Come on," said the corporal.

"Hold!" cried one of the soldiers. "What is that?"

They all looked in the direction he pointed, and they saw standing a few paces from one of the walls a skeleton, with one hand outstretched, and the other resting upon its head.

A feeling of horror came over them all as they looked upon this figure, which shed around it from its festering, yellow-stained bones a kind of phosphorescent light. It was profoundly still, but there was no mistake in the fact that there it was.

"Who sees it?" gasped the sergeant. "Do—you—all?"

"All—all!" said the soldiers. "It is death."

"No—no."

The soldiers made a hasty rush towards the trap-door, but the corporal cried out—

"Stop! halt! Are we to be scared from our duty by such a sight as this here? I, for one, will not. A musket—give me a musket one of you."

"Here," said a soldier. "It is loaded."

The corporal placed the musket to his shoulder, and pointed it at the skeleton figure.

"I swear," he said, "be you angel or devil, that I will fire at you if you don't speak and let me know why you come here. I don't pretend to say that you are alive, because that don't seem possible; but you have not come here without a purpose. Speak!"

"Beware!" said a deep, hollow voice.

"Beware of what?" said the corporal. "Of what would you warn us to beware? Speak again, I charge you!"

"Hence—hence—hence!" said the figure, apparently, although they could see no movement of its fleshless bones.

"Fire upon it!" cried the sergeant.

"Shall I?"

"To be sure. That will try it."

Bang! went the musket with a tremendous uproar in that confined space, and when the noise a little subsided, and the soldier with the link stepped forward, and held it, although with trembling hands, in the direction of the figure, it was gone.

"Gone!" said the corporal. "I have scared it off by the shot, that's quite certain."

"No," said the sergeant—"no. Look!"

The figure appeared again in precisely the same spot that it had before occupied; but it was only for a moment, and as if for the purpose of showing how futile had been the musket-shot, for there came a peal of the same yelling laughter that before had broken upon their ears with such a stunning effect, and then all was still, and the spectre vanished.

Even the corporal, who certainly had the most courage upon the occasion, rushed back, and grounded the musket, with a look of consternation and horror upon his face.

"I don't know," he said, "what to say to this exactly."

"Nor I," said the sergeant.

The men crept towards the trap-door, and one of them said—

"I don't see any good in staying here. Let's go."

"Yes," said the others. "The rain has all but given over; let's go. Our horses are out in the open air, and will be all the better for a canter. Let's go at once, sergeant."

"Hold!" said the sergeant. "We ought not, my men, to think of what we had rather do, or not do just now; but of what we shall have to say about this affair to others. When the question is put to us of 'Did you search the old mill?' and we have to reply that we had meant to do so, but were frightened out of it by a ghost, we shall look rather foolish."

"Rather, indeed," said the corporal, "and, for my part, I will go all over the building, if I go alone."

"I will be with you," said the sergeant, "of course."

The men wavered; and then one said—

"We will all do our duty."

"Yes," said the others; "we obey orders, sergeant."

"No, my men," said the sergeant; "this is not by any means regular duty, so I will not order you upon it; but if with good will you will all follow me, do so."

"We will—we will."

"Come on, then. I don't suppose that there is more than one room or loft above this one that we are in, and when we have fairly looked at that, I think we may take upon ourselves to say that we were not frightened from searching the place."

They now advanced to the opening in the roof, through which Claude and his friends had made their way by the aid of the rope; but as rope there was none now, it did not seem so easy as it might have been to ascend to it.

The soldiers were tall men, though, and one of them proposed to stoop down and let a comrade stand upon his back, and so scramble up, when the next could do the same for him, and so on, until one was only left below, who might be considered as on duty there in the capacity of sentinel.

This was a proposition at once so feasible and so easy to carry out, that they all acceded to it. The only little difficulty consisted in who should ascend to the unknown loft above first; but the corporal put that at rest by proposing his willingness to do so; and, accordingly, one of the men went on all fours, and the corporal, when he stood upon his back, found that he could just reach the sides of the hole in the roof, and drew himself up by his hands, which his military exercises enabled him to do with considerable ease and dexterity.

"Is all right?" said the sergeant.

"Yes. Nobody seems to be here; but it is very dark. Come on with you, and bring the torch."

"Yes; coming."

In the course of a few moments, now, the whole of the party, with the exception of one man who remained below on guard, was in the upper part of the old mill.

Several of them crowded to the window, or opening in the wall, through which Claude and his party had made their way to the roof of the building, and they did so more from the satisfaction they experienced from getting a mouthful of fresh air than for any other cause, for the atmosphere of the mill was full of smoke, notwithstanding they had by making an outlet from it succeeded in letting a sufficient quantity escape to make the air just endurable.

The soldiers were now so close to Claude Duval and his friends, that they might have touched each other; and then the corporal said—

"There seems to be a kind of balcony with rails outside here, is there not?"

"Yes," said the man, with the link. "One of you hold the light, and I will get out, and have a look about me at what sort of a place it is."

The corporal took the light, and the soldier scrambled out of the window; but the moment he let much of his weight rest upon the little balcony, and its light railing, down it all went with a crash to the ground—a depth of nearly fifty feet.

This would certainly have been a fatal accident to the soldier, had not the corporal caught him by his belt and held him by it against the ledge of the window till three or four of his comrades got a good hold of him and pulled him in.

"A narrow escape that," said the corporal.

The soldier looked quite white, and was for some few minutes unable to speak. Then with a shudder, he said—

"I thought I was gone, corporal. I owe you my life."

"Pho—pho! Don't mention it."

"Yes, but——"

"Oh, stuff. These things always happen in service, you know. All I wish of you is, that if you see me ever going in the same way, you will hold tight, my man, that's all."

"Indeed, I will."

The corporal had dropped the torch in the anxiety to save the man, but it had not gone out, and one of the soldiers, by waving it in the air, got it into a flame again.

The nearly fatal accident that had occurred had had the effect of damping the ardour of the soldiers a little; and after satisfying themselves that there was no one in the loft, they proposed to get away again as quickly as possible, which the sergeant did not oppose.

"I don't see," he said, "that we can do any more good here. We have searched the whole building."

"We have," said the corporal. "Let us leave it now. The smoke that cannot get out at the hole in the wall seems to find its way up here, and the sooner we get out of it the better."

"Come on, then."

The men were not at all sorry to leave that loft, and they sprang down one by one into the room below very quickly. The sentinel reported that he had seen nothing, but that a rushing noise of something on the outside of the mill had rather startled him. They let him know that it was the fall of the little balcony and its railings that had produced that noise, and then they hurriedly walked to the trap-door to descend to the basement story of the place.

"I say," whispered the sergeant to the corporal. "It's an infernal old den, this, and worth nothing."

"Not a mag."

"Well, then, it's only a harbour for such fellows as those we have been after, and there is but one way to prevent it from being such in the future. Do you throw the link into a corner among the straw when we come out, and the confounded place will be burnt down before the morning, and all the ghosts along with it."

"It wouldn't really be a bad thing to do so."

"A bad thing! It would be a good thing, I tell you. Come, mind you do it now."

"I will."

"That's right. You needn't say anything to the men about it. I will march them out, and as you follow you can do it. They won't know what you have done with the link, you know."

"All's right, I'll manage it. It will make a nice bon-fire, at all events, if nothing else. I will do it, you may depend."

The sergeant was quite satisfied with this ready acquiescence of the corporal in the idea of setting fire to their enemy's quarters before leaving, and he ordered the men to march out of the mill. They obeyed him with all the readiness possible, for they were by no means enamoured of that place, and were glad enough to get out of it.

The corporal remained last, and then he threw the link into a corner of the room, saying as he did so—

"I sincerely hope that it will soon burn down the old den, for I don't know when I have had such a fright as that skeleton ghost, if, indeed, it were such, gave me, though I did manage to fire at it."

He then left the mill, and it may be here remarked that they all, either unintentionally or wilfully, it is rather hard to say which, forgot that there was such a person as Mr. White, attorney at law, lying upon his back in the lower room of the old building.

CHAPTER CCCXXX.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS ARE IN GREAT PERIL IN THE MILL, AND SO IS MR. WHITE.

WHILE all this was going on, Claude and his two friends were snug enough at the top of the mill, but they little suspected the nice little design that the sergeant and corporal had concocted between them.

They, the highwaymen, had thought of smoking out the soldiers, but in a much more effectual manner the latter had thought of burning them out by setting fire to the building.

Claude did not think it exactly prudent to say anything for some little time after the soldiers had left the upper loft, for neither he nor his friends could possibly take upon them to be quite sure that that was not a mere ruse, or that they were really gone.

After about a quarter of an hour more had lapsed, and when by the most intense listening nothing could be heard of any one in the narrow apartment immediately below the roof of the mill, they began to conclude, as was the fact, that their foes had really gone.

"Jack," said Claude, "where are you?"

"Here, all right."

"And you, Dick?"

"I am here, Claude," said Turpin, "and I do think those fellows are gone at last."

"So do I."

"Be careful, though, yet," said Jack. "They may be lurking about, and we must not throw a chance away."

"Certainly not. Ah! what is that below? I see some figures, and I hear voices, too. They are tired of it, and are leaving the mill."

From the position he occupied, Claude could see pretty well over a ledge to the meadows below, and, dark as it was, he saw that the little troop of soldiers were on the move from the spot. The rain still came down; but it was only in a light, scattering kind of way, now; so that beyond the great discomfort that the wet state of the meadows would be sure to inflict upon them, there was nothing in the condition of the weather that could be any valid excuse for the soldiers seeking further shelter, merely for the sake of shelter.

Their horses had been picketted close to the mill, under cover of some trees, which had in some measure, though not to a great extent, protected them from the storm. The saddles and housings of the steeds were saturated with water; but the soldiers set about drying them as well as they could with such means as were at their disposal.

Situated as the highwaymen were, the sounds of the voices of the men below came quite clearly up to them, and they had no difficulty in hearing every word that was uttered. Indeed, the sounds came to them in quite a startlingly distinct fashion, as if they had been close at hand.

"Who can lead to the high road by a short cut?" said the sergeant. "We shall be up to our necks in these meadows soon, if we don't get out of them."

"I know the way," said the corporal. "It is directly past yonder clump of trees, and then we are on level ground."

"Come on, then," said the sergeant. "We have done all we can; and so I shall make away to head-quarters again."

The soldiers followed the sergeant and corporal, and as they went, they swore dreadfully in their anger at the whole affair; for they looked forward to the serious job it would be in the cleaning line on the morrow after the draggling ride through those meadows before they could present themselves for inspection to their officers. Moreover, several of them had rather serious bruises from the fall they had experienced during the attempts to open the trap-door.

CLAUDE AND THE PRINCESS DANCING A MINUET.

"They are gone," said Claude.

"The devil go with them!" said Turpin.

"Well, I think you are mistaken there," added Claude, "for I don't see the lawyer anywhere; and the old gentleman you have mentioned is more likely to stay behind and keep him company."

"But where can the lawyer be?" said Jack. "Surely nothing has happened to him in the mill?"

"There is no saying just yet," said Claude; "but the most likely thing is, that when he found there was likely to be anything in the shape of danger, he ran off, and left the soldiers to encounter it alone. He was certainly not with them when they came up so nearly to us just now."

"Do you think not?"

"Certainly; he would have said something if he had been. I am glad, by-the-by, that the soldier was saved from falling from top to bottom of the mill along with the balcony and its appendages."

"So am I," said Jack.

"And I, as it has turned out," said Dick; "although I doubt if they would have said as much concerning us. But what is that odd crackling noise that I hear? Just listen to it, Claude."

"A crackling noise is it?"

"Yes. There it is again."

"Ah, I hear it now quite plainly."

"And I, too," said Jack; "but I cannot think what it can possibly be."

They all three now listened with the most marked attention to the odd crackling noise that seemed to come from the lower part of the mill, and it is just possible that they mighthave listened to it for a still longer period than they did, without being able to come to anything like a just conclusion concerning it, but that a circumstance took place that had the effect of opening their eyes, both literally and metaphorically speaking, to the exact truth of what was going on.

A dull red light began to show itself in the air, and to impart a strange radiance to the old mill.

It was Jack who exclaimed—"Why, that is fire!"

The moment he pronounced the one word "Fire!" it gave to Claude Duval and Dick Turpin a clue to the whole mystery of the strange crackling noise that had so much puzzled them, and they cried out with one voice—

"The mill is on fire!"

This was a state of things that required the most prompt and decisive action, and Claude was upon his feet in a moment.

"We must get out of it," he cried, "as quickly as we can. It is all wood, and will burn like a match."

"Yes; but how?" said Jack, who, after leaning over the side of the roof they were on, rushed back coughing from a mouthful of dense smoke that he had inhaled.

"How?" cried Claude. "Why, the way we got here, to be sure."

"Always forgetting," said Jack, "that the little balcony and railings that helped us up here are now gone."

"But you don't mean to say, Jack, that we are to stay up here and be roasted in this infernal mill?"

"It would be a hard case."

"Rather," said Dick, "and one that I don't intend shall be mine if I can possibly help it."

"Never mind," said Claude. "Where is that rope that we brought with us? Who has it?"

"I have it," said Jack, "and four or five yards more to add to it, if they are at all likely to aid us; but if your idea is to descend by its aid, I think you will find it to go about half way, that is all."

"Half way is something."

"Yes, but not enough, Claude. I must confess, that I think we are rather in what may be called a fix here."

There was at this moment a loud crash, and from one side of the mill that had taken light, there came rushing up a monstrous flame, hissing and crackling against the wet wood-work.

"Here it comes," said Jack.

"It does indeed," said Dick. "I can feel the hot glow of it even now upon my face. Claude, what do you propose now?"

"Escape."

"Escape, is the word, but it seems one more easy to utter in the present state of affairs, than to carry out. I don't seem at all to like the position of things here."

"We are lost." said Jack.

"Not so," cried Claude. "I have tied one end of the rope securely to a strong iron ring that is here. Now, Jack, produce the supplementary piece of cord that you spoke of. Is it strong?"

"Here it is," said Jack. "I had it round my waist, in case of an emergency, as at times a bit of cord is of inestimable value · and as for its strength, it would hold us all three."

"Good."

Claude took the rope, and firmly tied it to the end of the piece he had already.

"That," he said, "with the other goes about half way down."

"How consoling!" said Jack.

"So that it leaves," added Claude, "only twenty five feet, or thereabouts, below the end of it."

"Ah!" said Jack, "a pleasant drop."

"Dick?"

"Yes, Claude. I know you have some idea of saving us all. What is it?"

"Lend me your coat!"

"My coat? Oh, to be sure. Yes—yes, my coat tied to the cord, and your coats tied to mine, will go the distance, or so near to it that the drop will be nothing at all to speak of. All's right! By Jove, we shall get the better of this bout. Jack, off with your coat, man, and I'll warrant we shall be on the ground, safe, in another five minutes."

There was not, in good truth, much time to spare now in the matter, for the flames had fairly laid hold of one side of the mill, and were roaring and crackling at a fearful rate. If there had not happened to have been such heavy rain recently, the whole building would, as Claude said, have blazed up like a match; but it took some time for the heat generated by the fire to dry the weather-boarding, of which the external sides of the building were composed.

It was to that circumstance alone that Claude aud his two friends upon that eventful occasion owed their lives.

"Quick! quick!" said Jack.

"Yes; steady and safe! All is well. Your coat, Jack."

"Here."

"That's it."

"Oh, Claude, I can feel the mill shake."

"The devil you can!" said Dick. "I didn't think that it had come to that just yet. How are you getting on, Claude?"

"Well."

Claude Duval would not allow himself to be hurried in tying the coats together. He felt how much would depend upon the ability and security with which he performed that part of the business; and he was resolved to do it well. It would be of little importance to gain a few moments in time, and to lose, as a consequence, everything in the inefficiency of the apparatus of escape.

Claude tied the coats together by the arms, and he found that he could do so with a feeling of perfect security, and then he flung them over the roof of the mill.

"Now, Jack," he said, "go."

"No."

"What do you mean by no? We will follow you."

"No; I will follow both of you."

"This is no time for nonsense," said Dick Turpin. "While you two are settling which shall go first, I will go; and when I get to the ground I can perhaps help you."

Dick, without another moment's hesitation, descended, and found that the coats brought him within a few feet of the damp ground by the side of the mill. Jack was firm in being the last, so Claude called out to Dick—

"Is it all right?"

"Quite," said Dick; and then Duval himself descended; and, although one of the coats tore a little, and he thought that the mill itself shook, he did reach the ground in safety: but he was much alarmed for the safety of his friend above.

"Safe! safe!" said Jack.

"Don't cry out till you get of the wood," said Claude; "or rather out of the mill."

"Well, but all is well now."

"I hope so. Come on, Jack. I have hold of the coats. Come steady, now, old friend. Slow and steady."

Claude Duval really had the greatest apprehensions that poor Jack would never reach the ground in safety, and yet, what to do in the world to aid him he really knew not.

There were two dangers to guard against.

In the first place, after the passage of himself and Dick down the rope and the coats, Claude Duval did not think they were anything so secure as they had been; and in the second place, he felt as certain as possibly he could be that the mill itself shook, and showed some symptoms of topping completely over. Should such a catastrophe as that happen, it would be likely enough to involve him, Claude, in destruction, as well as Jack. It was, truly, a moment of fearful suspense.

Jack came sliding slowly down.

"Steady, Jack!"

"Yes, Claude; yes. The rope is—is ——"

"What?"

"Only cracking."

Even as Jack spoke, the rope parted and down he came; but Claude was resolved to save him, and with great dexterity he, without actually catching him in his arms, broke his fall; so that what with the coats and that friendly interposition as well, Jack reached the ground without sustaining any injury at all.

"You are safe, Jack!"

"Quite. Thanks to you, Claude, otherwise I had been a dead man."

CHAPTER CCCXXXI.

THE FUNERAL CORTEGE ARRIVES JUST A LITTLE TOO LATE.

SCARCELY had Claude and his friends time to congratulate each other upon reaching the ground in safety, when a most singular spectacle met their eyes, and for a time transfixed them to the spot with astonishment.

Turning just round a corner of one of the outhouses belonging to the barley mill, came one of the most singular cavalcades that they had ever seen—a cavalcade, too, which at such a moment was of strange and significant moment.

First there came two men in long black clothes—such as are worn at funerals—and with hat-bands hanging down their backs, after the absurd fashion of undertakers' men. Immediately following them came one man, with a white cravat, similarly attired to the others; and then came four supporting a coffin, with a pall over it.

Following the coffin there were six mourners, who, if one might judge at all from their appearance, were in a great state of affliction, for, according to the most approved mode among mourners, they each held a crumpled up white handkerchief to his mouth; for, strange to say, mourners at funerals always do hold their handkerchiefs to their mouths instead of their eyes, thus leading to the idea in some cases as though they were trying to smother their laughter, instead of stem the current of their grief for the departed.

Where on earth such a cavalcade as this had sprung from was the mystery, and in the dim light, cast by a lantern that was placed upon the coffin near to the head of it, they certainly looked extremely spectral and mysterious to Claude Duval and his two friends.

"Good gracious!" said Dick Turpin.

"This is surely our last moment," said Jack.

"Confound it, don't be frightened at a funeral," said Claude.

"The devil!" said Dick.

"If it be his funeral it's a good job, Dick, so don't put on such an appearance. Where are they all going, I wonder?"

The funeral cortege did not pause nor appear as if its members saw or paid the smallest attention to Claude Duval and his friends, but on it went past the door of the mill with a slow and solemn step, and then took a course towards one corner of the meadow.

The solemn and slowly moving figures—the dim spectral kind of light, and now and then an odd wailing noise that came upon the ears of the listeners, all combined to render the scene striking and picturesque in the extreme, while it invested it, too, with an aspect of terror, and was significant of thoughts of another world.

No doubt if it had depended upon Jack or Dick to stop the cortege of death, neither of them would have done so; but Claude was there, and he was really not a likely person to allow such a mysterious cavalcade to pass unquestioned.

"They are going," he said. "Let us follow."

"Oh, no—no!" said Jack.

"Well," said Dick, "I hardly know what to say."

"But I do," said Claude. "I hate to have anything to think about afterwards to puzzle me. I will follow them, I tell you. You can come with me both of you or not, as you feel inclined."

"If you go," said Dick, "I go."

"No—no," cried Jack again.

"Then you stay here, Jack."

"But, Claude——"

"Nay, Jack, I know as well as possible what you would say. All your superstitious fears are fully awakened in this matter, and you who would look upon possible danger as nothing, would shrink from interfering with yonder cavalcade; but I have made up my mind to it."

"Come on," said Dick.

"I will; and be they ghosts or living beings like ourselves, they shall find that I am not one to be trifled with with impunity."

As he spoke, Claude Duval dashed forward, followed clasely by Dick; and Jack, rather than be left alone probably, likewise followed them.

When Claude Duval got a little nearer to the funeral procession, he called out, in a clear, bold voice—

"Halt! Stop, I say. You do not pass on unquestioned."

No attention was paid to him, and the funeral passed on at the same solemn pace.

Claude would not be baffled, but passing the cortege, he turned abruptly and faced the two men at the head of the procession with a pistol in his hand, saying as he did so—

"Advance another step and I will test the vitality of some of you. I am a man of my word."

The procession stopped, and the two men held up their arms in an attitude deprecatory of his interference with them. One in a deep hollow voice spoke—"Rash man, forbear! The valour that would be great as against those who are mortal as yourself is useless when directed against us. Depart in peace!"

"Not till I know who and what you are."

"Beware—beware!" said the other man, and in that deep and solemn voice Claude could well imagine the one who had uttered the same word at the old mill.

"Thank you, my friend," he said. "I heard you say 'Beware' once before, and I don't know that anything came of it; so I don't mean to let you go on."

"Nor I," said Dick.

"Unless," said Jack, who by that time was by the side of Claude and Turpin. "Unless you declare who and what you are."

"There is one who may declare it," said the one with the wand, as he slowly advanced, "but we may not. Let the dead declare the secrets of the dead to these men. If they survive not, it is not the fault of our erring souls. That will not sit heavy upon our frail natures. Let the dead speak!"

Those who carried the coffin now set it down, and one lifted the lantern from it. Then as Claude and his friends looked on with interest, and Jack at least of the three with alarm, there was a strange commotion under the pall.

Jack stepped back.

"Hold!" said Claude in a whisper. "Don't let them see fear or hesitation, Jack."

Jack advanced again, but he shook with agitation as he looked upon what was passing.

The pall became each moment more and more agitated, and those who had been bearing the coffin shrunk down almost to the ground, as if they dreaded what was about to take place, while the others forming the funeral procession knelt down upon the moist grass and uttered low wailing sounds.

The man with the wand spoke.

"The body of the murderer cannot rest," he said. "It lies in unconsecrated earth, and till the great day when the sons of man shall arise and look again upon the light of day, will his frail dust agitate the folds of the covering that should hide it from mortal view. It is in vain that, chased through a world, the skeleton form is brought to a resting-place. It cannot rest—it cannot rest."

The agitation beneath the pall still continued.

"Claude?" said Jack.

"Well."

"This is the spectre funeral."

"You don't say so?"

"Oh, Claude, do not oppose this fact, for it is one. The body that lies in that coffin is, without doubt, that of the brother who killed his brother. The body of the fratricide cannot rest. Oh, let us away from this dreadful scene. I implore you to fly from it."

"Not yet."

"But, Claude—Claude, and you, Dick, too—only consider!"

"Only do you consider, Jack, if you please, that I am really very much interested, and if you will do so, I am sure that you will not ask me to leave this place. Come—come, be quiet, that is all I ask of you."

Jack saw that it was useless to contend with Duval upon this point, as he had made up his mind to stay, so he only retired a step or two, and in a crouching attitude, awaited the result of the extraordinary scene.

"You see," said the man with the wand.

"Oh, yes," said Claude.

"Depart, then, in peace."

"Thank you. I would rather stay."

"Oh, fool—fool!"

"Upon my life, you are very complimentary. Allow me to return it, by saying that in my opinion you are an ass."

"Ah! Dread my vengeance!"

"I won't."

The agitation in the coffin under the pall increased each moment, and the pall itself was shaken violently to and fro. The man with the wand raised it in the air, and muttered some words that were not intelligible to Claude, and then he touched the coffin with the end of it. The mourners raised another wailing cry, and the curtain of the pall began to rise up, and it was quite clear that some figure in the form of humanity was rising from the coffin and taking the pall with it as it did so.

The scene was rather an exciting one, and had it not been that terror really at the moment deprived him of the use of his limbs, the probability is, that Jack would have justified all that could have been expected from the affair, and taken to flight.

Neither Dick Turpin nor Claude Duval, though, were so affected.

"Beware! beware!" said the man with the wand—"beware! No mortal eye has ever looked upon this sight and left the brain of the sad spectator free from the wild madness that such a spectacle must produce."

"Very good," said Claude. "This is a fellow of some education, Dick. He uses very tolerable language."

Dick was silent. Without affecting him as it had done Jack, the scene certainly did in a manner take a hold of his imagination, and, perhaps, it did the same in a lesser degree to Claude, only he would not show it.

The figure in the coffin still rose up under the pall higher and higher; and being carefully covered by the black velvet of that funeral covering, it was left entirely to the imagination to conceive what it could possibly be like, and the effect of it so rising was truly shocking.

Up—up it went, till it had got to such a height, that the pall on its edge rested upon the ground, and finally upon the coffin, and then it paused; and the man with the wand said—

"Oh, enough—enough! Rest—oh, rest, perturbed spirit! Sufficient of thy awful presence is now apparent. Rest—oh, rest!"

"I beg to differ from you, my friend," said Claude Duval.

The man with the wand looked sternly at Claude.

"Mortal, begone!"

"Oh, dear, no. That gentleman under the pall has quite roused my curiosity, as he raised himself, and I don't intend to go till I have had a good look at him; so, as it is beginning to rain again, the sooner he indulges me the better."

"Claude, are you mad?" said Jack.

"No, Jack; but you be quiet."

"Let me speak to you in kindness," said the man with the wand. "Pass on, and do not further interfere with this awful ceremony. It can lead you to no good, be you what you may; and it is possible that to your dying day you would repent of a foolish obstinacy in such a case."

"I am very much obliged to you for your kind advice; but I am one of the most obstinate fellows living."

"He is—he is!" said Jack.

"And," added Claude Duval, "when I take a thing into my head, there is no such thing as getting it out again."

The man with the wand muttered a curse, and then he called out—

"Arms—arms!"

The six mourners upon this advanced along with the men who had borne the body, and Claude saw that they had pistols in their hands; so he stepped back a pace or two, as he said—

"So—so, it has come to this, has it? This is the very first time that I ever heard of ghosts who used gunpowder; but if you have a mind for anything of that sort, I and my two friends here are well armed."

"D—n it!" said a voice, "I'm nearly smothered!" and then the figure under the pall suddenly threw it off, and sprang out of the coffin, exhibiting to the eyes of Claude and his friends a very ordinary-looking man in his shirt sleeves, and with a very red face.

"It's all up," said the man with the wand. "One word—Are you officers?"

"Officers?" said Claude. "To be sure not."

"Then what the devil are you?"

"Permit me, first of all, as your conduct and appearance is much more mysterious than that of me and my friends, to ask you that question."

"Smashers!" said the man with the wand.

"Oh, coiners of base money?"

"Not at all base when it goes; but base enough when any one won't take it. So now you know all about it, and, perhaps, you will say who you are?"

"I will. In the first place, my name is Duval!"

"What, Duval the highwayman?"

"Well, they do call me a highwayman, I rather think."

"Hilloa, comrades! it's all right. Oh, my eye! if we had but known this before, what a trouble we might have spared ourselves! Why, it's Claude Duval, the great highwayman, after all!"

The strange assemblage crowded round Duval, and looked at him with interest.

CHAPTER CCCXXXII.

DUVAL AND HIS FRIENDS MEET WITH AN ADVENTURE AT BERRYMEAD PRIORY.

Jack was now so thoroughly ashamed of the fears that he had shown in the matter, that he quite shrank back, and Duval had to call him to persuade him to appear at all.

"Come—come, Jack, come forward, and you, Dick, too."

"I'm here," said Turpin. "Upon my word, this is a good joke."

"And who may you be, sir?" said the man with the wand, who was evidently the chief or leader of the party.

"They call me Richard Turpin!" said Dick, as he slightly raised his hat, and bowed.

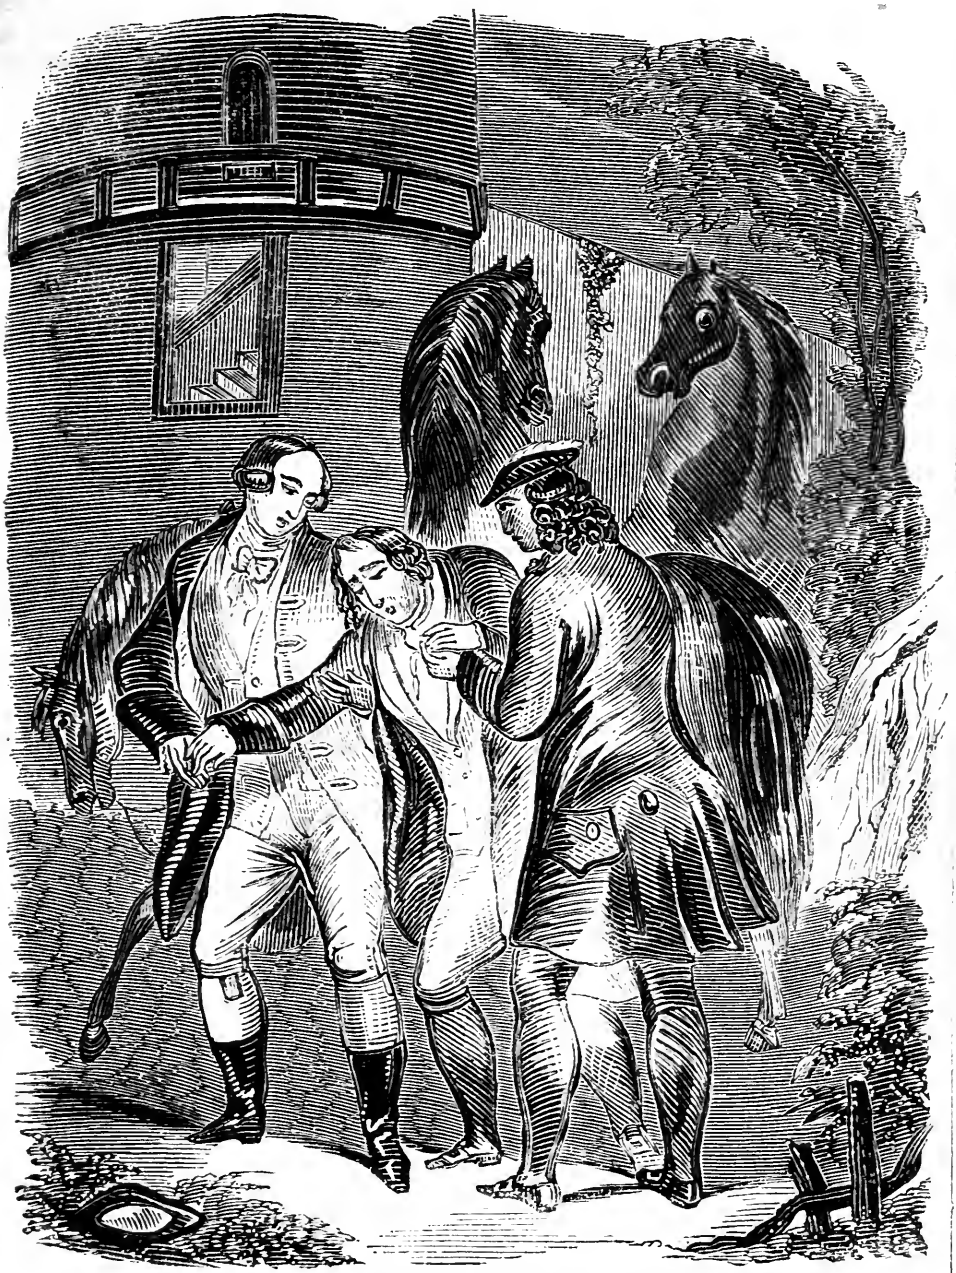
"Dick Turpin!" shouted the coiners. "Then who is the other?"

"Sixteen-string Jack, at your service," said Jack, advancing, and putting on as good a face as he could on the matter.

"Yes," said Claude, "and you did manage to frighten Jack."

"No, I was only pretending."

"Oh! oh!" laughed everybody; and Claude and Dick looked at each other and laughed; but Jack pretended now, if he had not before, for he affected not to be at all aware that what he had said had been received with any degree of incredulity, although it was so apparent that such was the case.



"I can assure you, gentlemen," said the man with the wand, "that if we had had the least idea such illustrious visitors as yourselves were in the mill, we should have tried to do the honours of it better than we did; but we mistook you for three officers from Bow-street."

"Nothing could very well," said Claude, "be a greater mistake than that, I take it. But I suppose now that the mill is doomed?"

"As how, sir?"

"Why, it is burning."

"Oh, no. We put that out. As soon as we found that the flames were getting to a height, we managed to quench them, and the old mill is safe enough now. It is stronger a great deal than it looks. And now, as the rain is coming down again, let me beg of you to come back to it, and we will try what we can do in the way of hospitality."

"Well," said Claude, "I am willing, for, to tell the truth, there are some matters connected with what we saw and heard in the place that I cannot understand. Of course, we know that all was delusion, but we don't know how the delusion was managed."

"You shall know all."

"Thank you; I and my friends much wish it."

"Of course, we have no secrets from you now, Claude Duval, nor from your friends, Turpin or Jack; and we will show you our magic-lantern."

"Your what?"

"Magic-lantern, by the aid of which we can easily produce the appearance of what kind of ghost we like."

"It is all explained, then," said Claude. "If that was the way it was done, you need not say another word about it. Do you hear that, Jack?"

"I do."

"And you, too, Dick?"

"Oh, yes; and I may say that I suspected it before. The effects that so surprised us could very well be produced by such means; and I do believe that a great many of the capital ghost stories that we hear are to be accounted for by the powers which those who are acquainted with science, and who are in possession of scientific apparatus, have over those who are ignorant of such subjects, and who have no such means by them."

"No doubt."

"But still," said the man with the wand, "I hope you will re-enter the mill, although there is nothing now to explain to you."

"Yes; lead on. But what, in the name of all that's troublesome, made you hit upon this affair of the funeral?"

"Why, the fact is, we had a great quantity of coined money in the mill, and our object was to get it away without suspicion; and when we got up this funeral set out, we still had our doubts about whether we had put out the fire or not. Those doubts are now resolved, and the mill is saved. We thought that you had set it alight to burn us out."

"No. It was the soldiers."

"Oh, we can easily understand all that now; but our suspicion was that you were Bow-street officers, and that you had a magistrate with you, who had procured the assistance of a company of soldiers, in case we should feel inclined to resist you."

"We have been all, then, going at cross purposes it seems."

"It does, indeed."

"But there was a skeleton hand and arm," said Jack. "I saw it myself appear down the trap-door. What do you say to that?"

"Oh, this is it."

The man dived his hand into his pocket as he spoke, and produced the very hand and arm that Jack mentioned, and held it so close to him, that the long bony fingers appeared to clasp his, Jack's, wrist.

"Murder!" said Jack; "murder! Don't put it near me."

"Oh, well, I didn't know you were afraid of such things."

"I ain't afraid of them. But—but—"

"But he don't like them," added Claude.

"Many people share with you the dislike," said the man with the wand, as he replaced the hand and arm of the skeleton in his pocket. "I suppose it had a pretty good effect from below?"

"Very good, indeed," said Claude. "But you must not judge of my old friend, Jack, by what he says or does now, for he has had a serious fall from his horse, and has been very much shaken, indeed; and is, I have no doubt, now struggling against the pain of his hurts upon that occasion."

Jack felt grateful to Claude for saying this much, as it in a manner saved him from the reproach of cowardice, which, otherwise, might to some degree have been attached to him.

They all now re-entered the old mill, which, although it had had a good warming from the flames, had yet in its principal parts escaped the destruction that at one time had really seemed to be inevitable.

"There is a story connected with this mill," said the man with the wand, "which enables us easily to frighten any of the country people who come to it."

"We know all about it," said Dick. "It is of the wo brothers, one of whom murdered the other here?"

"It is so. And so, every now and then we take care hat such sights should be seen here, and such sounds be heard, as shall keep up the delusion that the place is haunted by the spirits of the murderer and his victim."

"Then it is not so haunted?" said Jack.

Claude gave him a nudge with his elbow, as he whispered—

"Don't ask such questions, Jack."

"Why, no," said the man; "you did not suppose it was, did you, now, really?"

"Oh, no—no."

"Of course not. Confound these fellows of soldiers! they have not left us a table or a chair in the place, I declare. And how it does smoke, too. Fuff! It is enough to smother one. What on earth have they done to the chimney? The explosion of the few ounces of gunpowder that were put into it could not have stopped it up. It ought, on the contrary, to have cleared it."

Claude laughed.

"You have us to thank for the condition of the chimney," he said. "We tried to smoke the soldiers out of the mill by stopping it up with some old sacks from above, but they can easily be moved."

The man laughed, as he cried out—

"You, Jem Brown, go up and clear the top of the chimney. You hear that it is stopped with some sacks."

"Yes, Mister Blue," said the man.

"What an odd name," said Jack to Claude. "His name is Blue."

"That is to show that I'm anything but green," said the man, who overheard Jack's whisper.

"Excuse me," said Jack, "I meant no offence."

"And none is taken. Of course, Blue is not my name; but a man must call himself something; so that is short, and answers the purpose here quite as well as any other; so you will be so good as to know me as Mr. Blue."

"Very well," said Claude. "Ah, I can see the smoke going up the chimney again all right. The mill will soon be clear enough."

"It will," said Mr. Blue; "and in the meantime allow me to offer you such refreshment as I can command. Come, my men, do the best you can in honour of our illustrious visitors upon this occasion."

Thus urged, the coiners, for whose society, however, Claude Duval by no means evinced the greatest longing in the world, set about propping up, as well as they could, one of the broken tables, and then they spread the pall upon it by way of a cloth, which made Jack look rather askance at it, for he did not exactly like the idea of eating or drinking on such a funeral-looking emblem as that.

From a concealed cupboard, then, the coiners produced various good things in the eating and drinking way, so that the table was soon well spread; and then Mr. Blue said—

"I'm afraid I cannot say sit down, for those fellows of soldiers have broken all the chairs, but we must just manage the best way we can. Ah, that will do—that will do."

One of the coiners had managed to lay a flat piece of board across two of the broken chairs, and so to extemporise a very tolerable form, upon which Claude and his friends could rest themselves with ease, and they at once did so, and fell to work upon the eatables and drinkables before them.

Mr. Blue called to his gang of coiners, who seemed to be completely under his control, to come to the table, and the whole party was soon quite jolly and as friendly as if they had known each other for twenty years at the very least, instead of only half an hour.

"It gives me great pleasure," said Mr. Blue, as he rose with a glass in his hand. "It gives me great pleasure to propose to this highly talented and honourable company, the health of our illustrious visitor, Claude Duval, whose name in the annals of adventure must be familiar to you all as one who, under all conditions——"

"Amen!" said a voice.

Mr. Blue dropped the glass that he had been holding by its rather slender stem between his thumb and fore-finger, and looked around him in surprise.

"What is that?" he said, "oh! what is that?"

The coiners all looked at him, and so did Claude and his friends, and then Jack said, in rather a tremulous voice—

"I don't see any good, now, in playing off any of your tricks to try to frighten us."

"It is not with my good will," said Mr. Blue, "that anything of the sort is done."

"But, there was something."

"Yes, there was. Somebody said Amen!"

"Amen!" said the voice again.

They all now sprang from their seats, and Mr. Blue, in a very angry voice, cried out—

"Which of you is playing this foolish trick? I won't have it!"

"It's none of us," said the coiners all in a breath. "It's none of us."

Mr. Blue himself looked a little put out of the way, but he managed to get over his surprise in a few moments, and then he said—

"Well—well, I suppose it is nothing, after all."

"We all heard it," said one.

"And so did we," said Claude.

Dick smiled, and Mr. Blue looked rather suspiciously at him, as he said, in a tone of reproach—

"Ah, Turpin, so it was you who, after all, was playing us this little trick?"

"Not I."

"Then, I don't know what to make of it. But come what may, I will finish the toast that I was about, with another glass, as that one is broken; so now again I say, that if the devil himself—"

"Oh, lor!" said the voice again.

The coiners looked at each other with apprehension, and it was quite evident, from the expression upon their faces, that they had nothing to do with the sounds that disturbed the harmony of the feast.

"This is quite inexplicable," said Mr. Blue. "I cannot make it out. Where did the noise come from?"

"There!" cried half a dozen voices, and as many fingers were all at once pointed to one corner of the spacious apartment, in which there was a quantity of straw. "There!"

Dick laughed again.

"Ah, Turpin," said Blue, "you know something of this, I am certain."

Dick Turpin made no answer to this supposition, but Mr. Blue at once went to a corner of the room and got a toasting-fork that hung there, which he brandished over his head, saying—

"If any one be crouched there among the straw, I will give him a hint to come out."

With this, Blue stepped up to the straw, and gave two or three such well-directed thrusts with the toasting-fork among it, that a voice yelled out—

"Murder! Oh, don't! Murder! Oh—oh! Put me in some cool place, do, and I will give you lots of advice for nothing. Oh, murder!"

There was a great commotion among the straw, when Mr. White, the lawyer, who had been completely forgotten by Claude Duval, rolled on to the floor.

"Oh, spare me!" he cried. "Oh, dear—oh dear! If you are the devil, pray recollect that I have done your work for a good many years in this world, and you ought to have some mercy upon me."

CHAPTER CCCXXXIII.

MR. WHITE MAKES RATHER AN IMPORTANT REVELATION UNKNOWINGLY.

When Claude Duval and Jack saw the attorney, and heard how he bawled out his appeal for mercy, they joined Dick in a roar of laughter, in which the coiners soon joined, when they saw there was really no danger.

"Laugh—laugh, ye fiends!" cried the lawyer, as he discumbered his face from the straw, "I appeal to your master, the devil, himself."

Upon this, they only laughed more, and Claude, turning to Dick, said——

"You recollected this fellow, but really I did not."

"Oh, yes," said Dick. "The moment he said, 'Amen' I knew his voice again."

"Gentlemen," said Mr. White, "allow me to remark, that, although even in such a place as this, to which I have been blown by a very unexpected explosion of a quantity of gunpowder, I yet hope that you will feel disposed to treat me with liberality and respect."

"Certainly," said Mr. Blue. "Who are you?"

"John Doubleday White, Esq."

"And what are you?"

"Well, I suppose, these questions are matters of form in these courts, for, of course, you know very well, gentlemen fiends, who and what I am; but I do not at all wish to be contumacious or unpolite, so I admit at once that I am an attorney."

"A lawyer!"

"Yes, commonly and vulgarly called a lawyer, which, I suppose, accounts for my being here, though I must confess I never believed there was such a place at all till now, as there was no evidence of the fact that I could ever find concerning it."

"And, pray, where do you suppose yourself to be, Mr. White?"

"Don't mention it; but it is commonly considered to be a very warm place, that is, down below—Hem!"

"Why, you don't mean to say you take this for—— Eh?"

"I—do—Hem!"

Another roar of laughter from the coiners awakened the echoes of the old mill, and Mr. White said, with a dubious look—

"You don't mean to tell me that I am mortal, do you? Laugh—laugh, you finds! Oh, dear, no!"

"Certainly not," said Blue; "you are quite right, sir."

"Ah, I knew it; but still I must say that, considering the place has the reputation of being rather a warm climate, I don't find it very oppressive just now; and if it should be no warmer, I—oh, lor!—oh, murder! Don't do that again. Oh, dear!—oh, dear!"

One of the coiners, upon finding that Mr. White conceived himself to be in a certain place of a hot description, had crept behind him with a lighted piece of stick, and held it against his lateral anatomy until the flame reached his skin, and caused him to give a most alarming jump, and to utter the exclamatory expression we have recorded.

"Who, in the name of all that is odd," said Blue, "is this person?"

"We know but little of him," said Claude.

"And that little," added Dick Turpin, "is, I am sorry to say, not at all to his advantage."

"Oh, dear!—oh, dear! Good devils, have some sort of consideration for a poor fellow, who, although he always——"

"Be quiet," said Blue.

"Yes, sir, if you please; but I was going to tell you all."

"Perhaps," said one of the coiners, "it would be as well to let him go on with his tale?"

"Oh, sir," said White, "I beg your pardon. I have not got that length yet. Your own tale, I suppose, sir, you mean, humbly. I am only an attorney, sir, if you please, and not a devil."

Claude and his friends had to turn aside to conceal their laughter upon this occasion, for it was quite evident that poor Mr. White was in a very sad state of mental confusion with regard to his whereabout in particular, add things in general. The explosion of gunpowder in the chimney of the old mill, which had prostrated him in the first instance, had so thoroughly and confusedly impressed him with the idea that he had gone direct to that region where such as he are supposed eternally to luxuriate, that nothing of an ordinary character sufficed to get him rid of the rather extraordinary notion.

The coiners were excessively pleased with the state of mind that Mr White was in, and they consulted with each other, not as to the means of awakening him to a sense of his real position, but as to the best way of thoroughly strengthening him in his delusion.

Blue whispered to Claude.

"I suppose it is in pursuit of you, and not of us, that this lawyer came here?"

"Precisely so."

"Well, then, you can do as you please in the matter. Only say what you propose, and my men will assist you in it."

"Very well, do so, and I will take care that if he should prevaricate in any way, some means shall be resorted to to convince him that that is a policy which here brings with it rather a prompt and, perhaps, uncomfortable retribution. Leave that to me."

"I will."

Claude now stepped up to Mr. White, and Blue, with a look of gratification, whispered to one of his gang of coiners who went to a corner of the room, and after some seeking, returned with a pair of iron nippers, or pincers, which he handed to Blue, who then stationed himself exactly behind Mr. White, who had been lifted from the floor and placed upon a chair, to which the coiners had bound him tightly.

Claude spoke to him in a deep clear, distinct voice.

"Your name is White, and you are an attorney?"

"I—I am. Oh, dear! I am."

"Silence!"

"I only——"

"Peace, I say, or else it will be the worse for you."

"A great deal the worse," said Blue, as with the pincers he gave Mr. White a rap that made him jump again.

"I am a dead man!" said White.

"I know that," said Claude. "Now tell me. Whom came you to seek to the old mill?"

"Claude Duval, and the other thieves," said Mr. White.

This was a sincerity of expression that Blue would have rewarded by a rather severe pinch, but Claude motioned him not to do so; and as Mr. White saw him, he thought that it was some conjuration that was being practised against him, and of which he would soon feel the effects, and he groaned accordingly.

"You say you came here in search of Claude Duval and others. Who are the others?"

"One is Dick Turpin."

"And who else?"

"There is another, most gracious gentleman fiend, but I don't know who he is, so I cannot tell you. You, however, know, without a doubt."

"I do."

"Of course you do. But situated as I am now, that is all past, and there is no further interest in the affairs of the world that I am upon and have belonged to."

"None whatever. Have you any papers or documents about you?"

"Yes, a few."

"Give them up."

"With great pleasure. I—I—that is, if you please, of course I will give them up. Here is a little packet of letters and other matters, only interesting to those whom they may concern. Hem! I have nothing else."

From the manner of Mr. White, the man who had the rather odd name of Blue, thought that he had something else that he wanted to conceal, so he gave him a nip with the pincers, as he said—

"Liar and slave! You need not attempt to deceive us."

Mr. White gave a yell of agony, and would have bounded up from the chair only that he was tied tolerably firmly to it, and then, while the tears came to his eyes, he said—

"Oh—oh, you might as well have said that you wanted to see young Mr. Beachem's letter, without pinching a piece out of the small of my back at the same time. Here it is. Oh—oh, here is the letter."

Claude Duval had not the remotest idea of what Mr. White meant by an allusion to young Mr. Beachem's letter, but he did not let him see that the name and the existence of such a letter was to him perfectly new, so he merely held out his hand, saying—

"Give it to me."

"It is here, worthy sir—it is here; and there is my memorandum of private instructions, likewise, if you please."

Claude Duval took the memorandum, and read as follows—

"Mr. White,—You will have no difficulty at all in finding Berrymead Priory, as it used to be called, in Acton. It is now, as I told you, a nunnery, and there you will find Alicia. The letter that you have, you will give to the Lady Abbess, who will find from that that we entirely trust you in the matter, and that if you say that the deed is properly signed, we shall be satisfied. After that, she has her further instructions regarding Alicia.

"It is very probable that you will be introduced to Father Garvey, and if so, you will find him a very amiable, pleasant man, indeed. He is the confessor of the young ladies at the nunnery, and quite in our interest, as he is to get a thousand pounds wholly to himself.

"As soon as you have successfully carried out this affair, you will be so good as to come to London again, and let me and my father and mother know, when the reward that we promised you will be paid to you without fail.

"Till then, believe me to be yours truly, "B."

When Claude Duval had read this letter through, he was not much wiser than before, but he could well understand that some villany was intended; and he said, in a cold, severe tone to Mr. White—

"You must tell all."

"Yes, gracious dev—I mean, sir, I will tell all. You see, Miss Alicia Horton is the niece of Sir John Beachem, who is a catholic baronet, and because she will not marry his son, Henry Beachem, they popped her into the nunnery; and there they intended to force her to sign a deed conveying half her property to the nunnery and the other half to themselves, as she will be of age directly; and the abbess assists them, of course, and so does the confessor, and the only person they are afraid of is young John Field, who is in love with her, and whom she loves, and who is a gentleman, although not a rich one."

"How much money has the girl, Alicia Horton?"

"About fifty thousand pounds. Her mother was Sir John's sister, and she married an officer in the Indian army, who was poor at that time, but to whom a rich relation left that sum. He was killed in battle, and the mother died of grief for his loss, leaving her child, Alicia, to the care of her uncle and aunt, Sir John and Lady Beachem, and their whole object has been to force her to marry their son, Henry; but she loves John Field, and so refuses, and, therefore, they are trying what I told you."

"But——"

Before Claude could say more, two of the coiners who had been keeping watch on the outside of the mill came in, dragging with them a man, whom they had made prisoner, and who, in a strongly marked Irish accent, called out—

"Och, then, murder, you villains! Bedad, an' what is it myself has done that I should be kilt entirely any way, and my young master murdered in cold blood?"

"What is this?" said Blue.

"We found, sir," said one of the scouts, "two men lurking about the meadow, and thinking them spies, we tried to frighten them away, but one of them knocked down Joe Ellis, so we hit him with our cudgels and he lies outside. This is the other."

"Lies outside, does he, you spalpeen?" said the Irishman. "It's yourself that lies inside, Oh, the poor master, who is only looking for the nunnery and lost his way, to be took up for a spy!"

"The nunnery?" said Claude. "What nunnery, and who is your master?"

"Bedad, then, I'm Dennis, his man, and me master is Mr. Field, and he is looking for the nunnery, where the swate darlint, Miss Alicia, is after being smuggled up."

"Is this possible?"

"It's myself that can't say that, but by the holy poker it's true."

"Follow me, some of you."

Claude and Dennis and his friends and some of the coiners rushed out into the open air, and there, by the aid of a torch, they found a young man, elegantly dressed, lying in a state of insensibility on the ground

"This deeply interests me," said Claude Duval, "I fear that, quite unwittingly, we have stopped one whom we would readily have permitted to proceed upon his course; and yet, after all, it may be for the best, for all we know to the contrary."

"It is so," said Jack.

"I am of the same opinion," said Turpin; "and if we can but rouse this young man to a state of consciousness, we may be able to do much more for him in the furtherance of his object than he could by any possibility have done for himself."

"We will try it, at all events," said Claude. "Come, Mr. Dennis, you be so good as to hold your master from the damp ground, and we will get some water and dash it in his face."

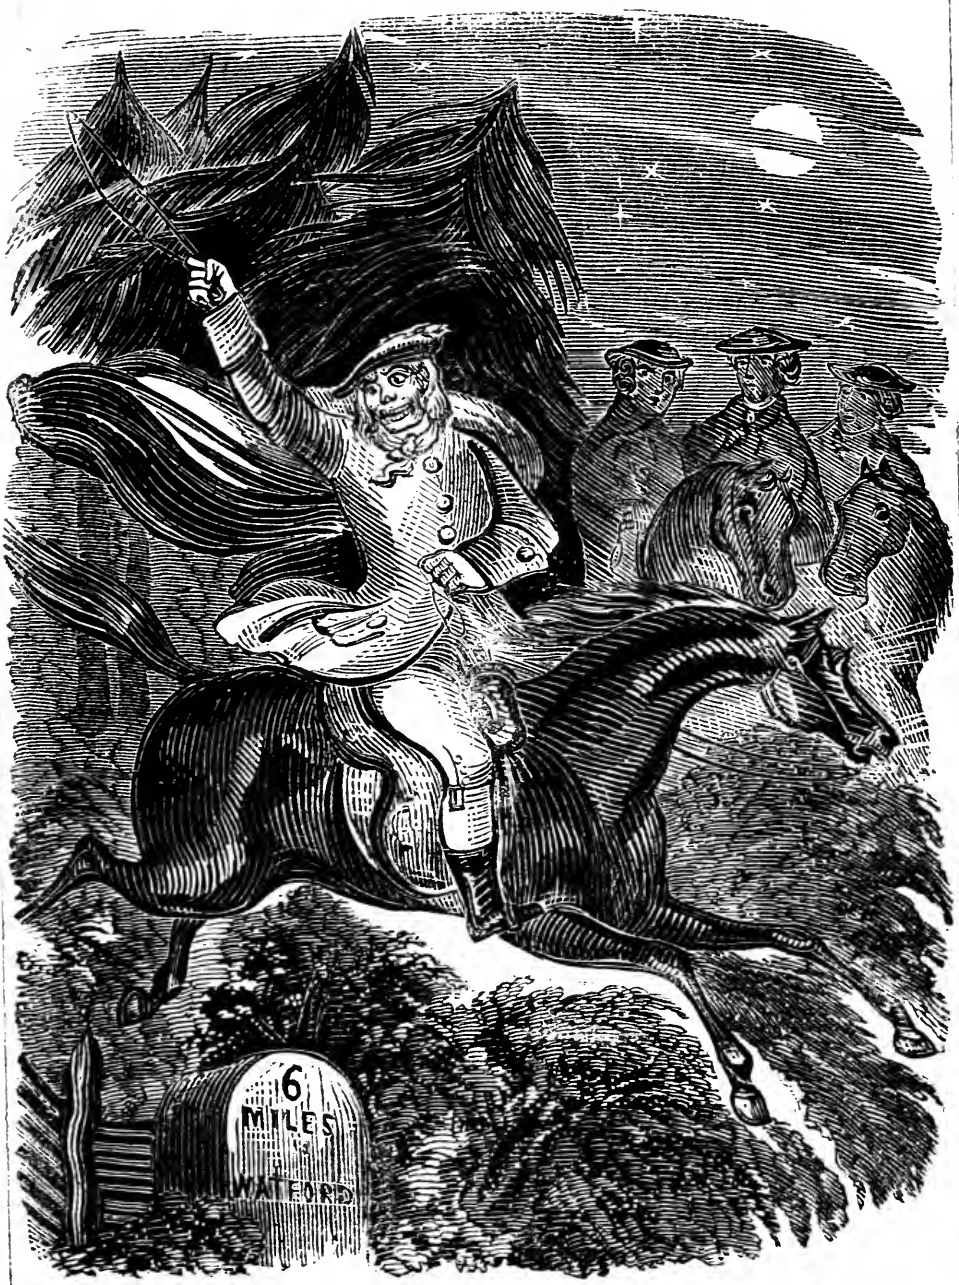
"Bedad, it's myself will do that same."

Claude Duval was much afraid that young John Field, as the attorney had named him, was severely injured, and so, taking him right up in his arms, he carried him into the mill.

"It's a strong chap that, by gor!" said Dennis, "for the master, though he isn't as fat as a piece of bacon without any lean, is heavy enough."

Mr. White looked at all that was happening with the dreamy look of a man who is only half awake, and when he saw Claude Duval come in with the insensible form of young Field, he said—

"Oh, dear, there's another! I wonder if that's a professional man that they have caught this time. Oh, dear—oh, dear!"



Claude asked for some wine, and Mr. Blue, from the mysterious cupboard, which really seemed to contain something of everything, produced some, and a little had the effect of reviving Mr. Field, who opened his eyes and looked about him.

"Are you a professional man?" said Mr. White.

"Be quiet," said Claude. "Ask no questions."

"Bedad, then, he ain't quite dead, though he is kilt," said Dennis. "It's how do you feel yourself now, Mr. Field?"

"Field—Field?" said Mr. White. "Oh, dear, who would have thought of his coming here!"

THE ADVENTURERS ALARMED ON BEHOLDING THE SKELETON HORSEMAN.

CHAPTER CCCXXXIV.

TAKES A GLANCE AT BERRYMEAD PRIORY, ACTON, AT EARLY DAWN.

It was quite evident that Mr. White, attorney-at-law, thought every one who was brought into the mill were consigned to the keeping of a certain elderly gentleman in the infernal regions.

Hence was it that, although the name of Field had struck him as not exactly belonging to his party, he thought he, too, had found a home in the infernal regions for some act or action which he, Mr. White, was not cognizant.

"Do you mean to say, sir," he said, addressing the young man, who was now fast recovering from the state of stupor into which a blow upon the head with a bludgeon had thrown him. "Do you mean to say, sir, that your name is Field?"

"It is."

"John Field?"

"Yes, John is my name."

"Oh, dear, then perhaps you are the very individual who was looking after a certain Miss Alicia Horton, as aforesaid?"

"Alica Horton!" cried the young man, starting to his feet. "What have you to say of her? If aught that it will give me joy to hear, speak quickly; but—but if your news be sad, it is better that you speak it not at all."

"Well, it don't much matter to either of us, now, sir," groaned Mr. White, "does it?"

"How do you mean?"

"Why, situated as we are, you know, sir—oh, dear, in such a place as this, you know, sir, where, if you are fond of a good roaring fire, I suppose it may always be had—eh?"

"Are you some madman."

"I don't think so, but I believe sir, we are both in——"

"Silence!" said Claude, who had only allowed the attorney to go this far, in order that he might be certain of the identity of the young gentleman as the lover of Alicia. "Silence, Mr. White; you are not yet permitted to speak, except in answer to a question."

"Yes, but—"

"I warn you. You will find yourself in the centre of the lake of burning brimstone, if you don't be quiet."

Upon this, Mr. White was so deeply affected, that over he went backwards, chair and all.

Young Field looked at Claude inquiringly, as much as to say, "What is the meaning of all this strange talk?" and then Duval said to him, in too low a tone to reach the ears of Mr. White—

"Sir, are you sufficiently recovered, do you think, to take an active part in any enterprise?"

"Oh, yes, if it concerns Alicia Horton."

"It does so."

"Then, I pray, sir, that you may consider me as quite well."

"Stop a bit. How came you in this neighbourhood at all?"

"I will tell you presently. I received an anonymous note, saying, that Alicia was a prisoner in Berrymead Priory, which is at the corner of a lane close to Acton, and I set off at once for the place, and my servant, Dennis, here—"

"That's myself," said Dennis.

"He thought that by going across the fields we should save a great extent of road; but, as is commonly the case when people try to take a near cut to any place where they are not well acquainted with the country, we lost ourselves, and were attacked in the fields by two men, one of whom struck me on the head. I know no more."

"Sir," said Mr. Blue, "llow me to say, how deeply I regret that my men should have made the mistake of thinking you an enemy."

"Your men? Who and what are you?"

"That, sir, permit me to say, is a secret that I must still keep to myself, for the present, if you please."

"Pardon me. Nothing can be further from my intention than to seek to intrude upon your secrets."

"Not a doubt of that, sir; and I can only add, that if this gentleman," alluding to Claude, "thinks proper to interfere in your affairs, or is of opinion that any effectual assistance can be rendered to you, I shall be most willing to aid him to the extent of my abilities in the matter."

"I am deeply obliged."

"I do think proper," said Claude. "From what I have heard, I think that it is our duty to aid you, sir."

"What, in the name of Heaven, have you heard?" said Mr. Field. "All this so amazes me, that I may well doubt, even now, if I am in my right senses. For Heaven's sake, sir, tell me if you know anything concerning Alicia Horton, for it is to her your speech seems to refer."

"Small blame to me," said Dennis, "if I don't think so too."

"Peace—oh, peace!"

"Peas is it you are after wishing for, sir? Bedad, me grandfather, who was one of the ould rale stock, and descended from the ould kings of Munster, had as illigant a crop of peas as you would wish to see, and one day he—"

"Dennis, I wish to hear this gentleman," said Mr. Field.

"Oh, well, I—oh!"

Dennis was silent, and then Claude said—

"You love Alicia Horton. Her aunt and uncle, she being an orphan and possessed of considerable property, wish her to wed their son, and her cousin, Henry Beachem; she loves you, and, therefore, refuses to wed him, and they, in revenge, and being solely actuated in the whole matter by the grossest cupidity, have placed her in a convent."

"Yes—yes, all that is true."

"Well, your object is to get her away from it."

"It is."

"And to marry her."

"Delightful thought! Oh, if I could but call Alicia mine, I should be the happiest of human beings; and I think, too, she would be happy in my care, for I would strive to make her so."

"No doubt of it."

"But, believe me, sir, whoever you may be, that I am not actuated by any motive connected with the property. If she had not one farthing in the world, she would be as dear to me as she is now, and I should still consider her as a priceless treasure."

There was such a tone of heartfelt sincerity about the young gentleman as he spoke, that it would have been quite impossible to doubt him for a moment, and Claude replied to him—

"Sir, it is an accident which has brought down privations upon her. That Alicia Horton is possessed of money, but that it has nothing to do with your affection for her, I can well believe; and yet I am glad that she is so well endowed, for money may be a great good, if in proper hands."

"That is true, sir."

"Well, read this, and it will give you some further insight into the affair in which you are so deeply interested."

Claude Duval handed him the letter of instructions which had been given up by Mr. White, and Mr. Field read it through with contempt and indignation. Then turning a melancholy gaze at Claude Duval, while the letter trembled in his grasp, he said—

"Are you—that is—am I to believe that——"

"That what, sir?"

"That this letter was addressed to you, and that you repent of—of the part you——"

Claude laughed, as he cried out—

"Oh, dear, no! I have not the honour of being a confidant of the Beachem family, I assure you. There is the gentleman from whom I get the letter, and to whom it was addressed."

Claude pointed to Mr. White, who, with his eyes fast shut, and his hands crossed upon his chest, was lying on the floor, with his leg over the chair, expecting each moment to find himself in the brimstone lake that had been mentioned, and the horrors of which had taken a firm hold of his imagination.

"That the man?"

"Yes, Mr. Field, that is the lawyer."

"His name is White?"

"It is."

"The rascal! Why, I can assure you, sir, that there is not a more cold-blooded, thorough scoundrel than this man, White, in the whole profession to which he belongs."

"I can very well believe that, Mr. Field; but it is quite a fortunate circumstance that we have got hold of him, and got possession, too, of his despatches. What do you say, Dick? You have heard all this affair. Do you feel inclined to assist Mr. Field in it to recover the Lady Alicia from the hands of those who hold her in bondage?"

"Indeed I do," said Dick.

"And you, Jack?"

"Command my best services."

"Then I have to inform you, Mr. Field, that we three will assist you, and I do think that, with your own resolution and our aid, much may be done. In fact, I do not believe but that we shall be able to wrest her from the hands of her persecutors. Do you accept of our aid?"

"Oh, my friend, how can I thank you?"

"Reserve all that till we have done you some good: The morning is now approaching, and it is time that we left this place. There is one thing, though, that I have to ask of you, sir."

"Name it."

"It is, to be content that we will befriend you, and not to seek to extend your knowledge of who and what we are, beyond what you know of us already."

"And that is nothing. But I give my word freely."

"Very well; then, we quite understand each other. And now, Mr. Blue, where are you?"

"Here."

"Will you send one of your men to look after our horses, if you please?"

"Certainly."

"And will you"—Claude here lowered his voice to a whisper—"will you take good care of Mr. White till you hear from me again?"

"That I will."

"Very good. That is all, then, that I shall ask of you, Mr. Blue, for the present; but from the kind and gentlemanly manner in which you have treated me and my friends, I hope that I may have the pleasure of at another time resuming our acquaintance; and if ever it should be in my power to do you a good turn, you may depend upon me."

"I am sure of that."

There was a tone of great dejection about this man, Blue, as he shooks hands and so spoke to Claude Duval. It was quite evident that he was a man of superior education, and it was a sad thing to think that he should have come to such a pass as to adopt such a line of life as he had, and which, sooner or later, would be quite certain to end in disgrace and death.

The coiners who had been sent out to look for the horses came back to say that they were all right, and Jack hurried now to the shed where they were to see if his own steed had suffered anything from the fall it had had. He hoped that, as he had, after all, received no injury but a good shaking, from which he had nearly recovered, that the horse was no worse off.

Claude now said to Mr. Field, appealing by a glance to Dick as he spoke—

"I think that the best thing we can all do now is to go to some quiet inn not very far from Acton, and there breakfast, where we can consult as to the best mode of proceeding at the nunnery?"

"I will be wholly guided by you," said Mr. Field.

"I think it is the best way," said Dick. "Have you a horse, Mr. Field, or are you on foot?"

"On foot, sir."

"Well, it don't matter much; we shall all have to wait till nightfall again, I expect, before anything can be done."

"No doubt," said Claude. "Oh, here is Jack. He, too, has been to see after the cattle. Well, Jack?"

"All's right. The horses are in good condition, and only, I suppose, would look a little grateful for half a peck of corn each."

"That they shall soon have. Now, Mr. Field, if you will come with us we will see what we can do to aid you; but you must keep your servant from getting us all into any difficulties by his blundering, and there is but little chance of our failing in rescuing Alicia Horton from the convent in which she is now confined."

CHAPTER CCCXXXV.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS HAVE RATHER A NARROW ESCAPE.

It was rather a hinderance to Claude Duval and his friends that Mr. Field and Dennis had not horses, as they were obliged to go at a walking pace for the purpose of accommodating them.

Claude preferred walking on foot with the bridle of his horse over his arm, for in that way he could converse with the young lover with much greater ease than as if he had been in the saddle and Mr. Field on foot.

They soon reached the high-road, and as the sun was just above the horizon, and the morning after the stormy character of the night was beautifully fine and fresh, it was quite a delightful thing to see nature, as it were, awakening, and the glow of the sunlight slowly but surely creeping over all things, both animate and inanimate.

The birds flew hither and thither, apparently in a wild delirium of joy, and filled the air with their joyous tones; and from every wild flower in the hedge-rows there exhaled some perfume more or less grateful to the senses.

"This is truely beautiful," said Claude, as they reached a rising spot of ground from the summit of which they could command rather an extensive view around them.

"It is," said Mr. Field. "How astonishing it is that people residing in London fancy that it is necessary, before they can get natural and pleasing scenery, to go to great distances, while the suburbs of the great city really present as many natural beauties as any part of the country can show to the eye of the lover of nature."

"It is a prejudice," said Dick, "and it is one that enters into our feelings with regard to all things. That which is at hand and easily attainable is never much prized."

"That, I suppose, is about the solution of the mystery," said Duval. "But however delightful the undulating country may be, and those dark patches of wood, and that pretty winding stream, which is the Brent, I suppose, and those fields with their rich luxuriance—yet there is one thing which, just now, we should all find, I do believe, quite as delightful."

"What is that?"

"Breakfast."

They laughed, and then Mr. Field said—

"It is I who impede your progress, being on foot; but if you will say where Dennis and I can find you, we will come after you as soon as we can get over the ground."

"Oh, no," said Claude, "let us keep together. What is that yonder, Dick, in the middle of the road apparently?"

"It is a sign," said Dick; "but, I suppose, the winding of the road makes it seem to us in the middle."

"No doubt—no doubt. Well, suppose we make up our minds to go to that inn, be it what it may, to breakfast?"

"Agreed—agreed!"

Upon this they rather quickened their pace, and Dennis said, in his rich unsophisticated brogue—

"Bedad, then, I have just thought of a wonderful plan of getting on mighty quick."

"How is that, Dennis?"

"Why, sir, it's as easy as kiss your hand. You see, sir, there's only three beastes here."

"Three what?" said Claude.

"He means horses," said Mr. Field.

"I beg to inform you, Dennis," said Dick Turpin, as he patted the neck of his beautiful and intelligent steed, "that I think there are very many creatures upon two legs that are much more beasts than this one upon four."

"No offence, sir," said Dennis. "The same to you, sir, and many of them. But as I was a saying, the way to get on quick, would be for you to gallop on at a mighty great rate, and for us to walk aisy and quiet after you; and then, when you get on a mile or two, you can wait for us, and when we reach you we can mount and gallop on, and you can walk after us, you know, and so on."

"And you fancy Dennis, that by that system we should make greater progress—eh?"

"Bedad, then, of course we should."

"Permit me to doubt the fact, Dennis. But it don't much matter, for here is a turn of the road, which will take us at once to the inn yonder, which sign we have had in sight now for some time."

The moment they turned the corner in the road and got fairly in sight of the inn, Dick reined in his steed, and said in a tone of alarm—

"Halt, Claude!"

"What is it?"

"Look! look! Are you blind?"

"Oh, I see now. This way—this way!"

Claude turned his horse's head in a contrary direction at once, and went off at a swinging canter, followed closely by his two friends, and leaving Mr. Field and Dennis in the middle of the road, staring about them in wonder and amazement at such extraordinary proceedings.

When Claude had got some little distance on the other side of the corner in the road again, he pulled up, saying—

"By Jove, that was a narrow escape."

"But what was it?" said Jack. "I saw nothing to give us any alarm. What was it, Claude?"

"You were not forward enough to see the entrance to the inn, Jack," said Claude, "or you would have observed that our friends, the soldiers, were there before us."

"The deuce they were!"

"It is a fact. If we had only advanced a little more, they must have seen us; but as it is they did not."

"Are you sure of that, Claude?"

"Quite, or they would have been at our heels before now. But do you just lay your hand upon the bridle of my horse, Jack, and I will go back on foot, and get Mr. Field and his servant to follow us."

"You need not. Here they come."

Mr. Field, as soon as he had recovered from his first surprise at the sudden disappearance of his new friends, had run on after them, for he could not suppose that they meant to desert him, after in so kind a manner proposing to befriend him in the way they had.

"Dick," said Claude, "and you, Jack, listen to me. I think it will be better, and, in fact, it is but right and proper, to let that gentleman know who and what we are. If, then, he has any scruples about an association with us, or about accepting our services, we can bid him good morning; but if he has none such, it will be much more agreeable to us that he should know us from our own lips, than find it out by some accident."

"I think so too," said Dick.

"Claude," said Jack, "tell him now, by all means, but keep the information from the servant. There is no occasion to fill Mr. Dennis's mouth with such news."

"None in the least. He shall know nothing. I will take his master apart, and let him know."

Mr. Field now reached the spot at which the three highwaymen had halted, and he said—

"Gentlemen, what is the meaning of this? I have no doubt of your good faith to me, for a moment, but this is rather an extraordinary start, is it not?"

"It is, sir," said Claude. "Pray come closer, and I will tell you all about it. You must know, sir, there were soldiers at the inn to which we were approaching, and that is the reason why we rather declined going to its door."

"But, you are not deserters?"

"Oh, no. I am a highwayman!"

Mr. Field reeled a step or two, as he repeated the word, "Highwayman?"

"Yes, I am a highwayman, and those two friends of mine follow the same profession. And now, sir, knowing what we are, if you feel that you compromise either your safety or your feelings by keeping further company with us, just say so, and we will wish you good morning."

"I know not what to say. Is this a jest?"

"Oh, no, sir. It is the sober truth."

Mr. Field looked from one to the other of them, with rather a scrutinizing gaze, and then he said—

"I have frequently heard of a highwayman who has done the most kind and generous acts to those who have been suffering from privation and misfortune. The name of that man is Claude Duval. Do either of you own that name?"

Dick and Jack looked at Claude and smiled; and then Duval, lifting his hat just a few inches from his head, said—

"I am that person, sir, and I think that there are two sorts of people who do me an injustice in this world. One of them make me out much worse than I am, or ever can be, and the other much better."

"So, you are Claude Duval, the famous——"

"Say highwayman, sir. I am not at all offended at being called by such a name. After a lawyer feels no way hurt at folks calling him one, surely the the more honest—because more straightforward and truthful—calling of a highwayman need not be thought such a disgrace. But a truce to badinage. Mr. Field, I am Claude Duval, the highwayman. I feel an interest in you, and in the young lady to whom you are attached. It is ever a great pleasure to me to go a little out of the way now and then to do a good action, and to frustrate villany and chicanery. It seems to me something like a kind of set-off against my own ill deeds; and so I will assist you, if you like; but if you object to the source from which the aid comes, say so, and we part as we met, and for the future are strangers to each other."

"I should be both foolish and ungenerous, Duval, in the extreme, were I to do such a thing."

"You accept, then, our services?"

"With many thanks, I do, and with far greater hopes of success than I had before. If there be a man in the world who can really aid me, it is surely you, with your courage and perseverance, and doubtless resolution, in whatever you undertake."

"Don't flatter me," said Claude.

"By heavens, I do not! I speak the genuine sentiments of my heart in what I say, I assure you, sir."

"Well, I am much obliged to you for your good opinion, then, and all I wish is, that you do not enlighten Dennis as to who and what we are; because, although we might easily enough depend upon his fidelity, we might not upon his discretion."

"There is no necessity to tell him; although, Duval, you know little of the Irish peasant if you are not aware that his natural cunning is quite sufficient always to guard him from saying that which he wishes not to say. But, now, will you take me yet a little further into your confidence by telling me who your two friends are?"

"Yes; this is Dick Turpin."

"What, the famous Turpin, who, they say, has a mare that is quite a fiend, and capable of anything, and which understands every word he says to her?"

"I am certainly Turpin," said Dick, laughing, "and this is my mare, Black Bess, bless her heart! I do believe at times that she does know what one says to her. Only look at her ears, now—she knows as well as possible that we are talking about her."

The intelligent look of Bess would need to have been seen to be believed; but, really, to judge from the attitude and manner of the creature, Turpin's idea that she knew when she was being spoken of did not seem to be at all out of the way.

"You have yet another acquaintance to make, Mr. Field," said Claude. "This is Sixteen-string Jack."

Jack bowed.

"You—you mean some successor of that person?" said Mr. Field.

"No; this is the veritable Jack."

"I thought he was—was——"

"Hanged, you would say," said Jack, "long ago; but, for all that, here I am. It is a long story; and at some other time, if you want to hear it, I will tell it to you, sir, and in the meantime rest content with the assurance that I am the only true and veritable Sixteen-string Jack."

"I am full of amazement, I confess," said Mr. Field.

CHAPTER CCCXXXVI.

CLAUDE READS THE LETTER TO THE ABBESS OF THE NUNNERY.

It must not be supposed that during this time the three highwaymen had remained standing on the road in such dangerous contiguity to their foes, the soldiers. On the contrary, they had walked on, so that they were nearly a mile from the corner in the road which hid them from the inn, which so fortunately was situated in a kind of hollow, from which very little of the road, either to the right or to the left, was visible.

Dennis kept at a respectful distance, at a sign from his master to do so; but he was terribly curious to know the meaning of the consultation that was going on, as, from the quietness of the party, he guessed that the conversation was very curious and interesting, indeed.

How to satisfy that curiosity, though, was a proposition that did not seem at all easy to solve; but yet he made up his mind that he would not lose anything in ths shape of information from the want of trying in an oblique way to get at it.

With this view he decreased the distance between himself and the party, which they observing, induced them to adopt some means of disappointing him, so Claude said loud enough for him to hear—

"I prefer the round ones."

"And I, kidneys," said Dick.

DICK MAKES A FIRE IN THE OLD MILL TO RESUSCITATE JACK.

"Well," said Jack, "you may say what you like, both of you, but give me the reds—the old original reds."

"Oh, bedad!" cried Dennis, "and it's praties they are talking about all this time. Och, murder! is it praties you mean, sir?"

"Yes," said Claude.

"Well, then, there is a pratie that is called the Ould Irish, and it's the maliest in all the world, and grows convanient to the boys in ould Ireland, and is so big by the same token, it often takes a whole family to punch one of them into the pot to boil."

"That's nothing," said Dick, "to a potato we have in Yorshire."

"Nothing?"

"Nothing at all. There is a potato called the Old Yorkshire Wheelbarrow."

"The what?"

"The Old Yorkshire Wheelbarrow, and it's a common thing to put a wheel on each side of it and a broom-stick for a handle, and then to scoop out with a spade about half a hundredweight of the inside, and it makes an excellent wheelbarrow."

Dennis looked confounded for a minute or two, and then he said—

"Oh, yes. It's myself have heard of them sort before. But the Clare praties bets 'em."

"How?"

"Why, they stick up on an end—mind, they are kidneys are the Clare potatoes—and then they get all the neighbours to hold them, and it takes a couple of weeks to scoop out the inside, leaving the walls about two foot thick, and it makes an elegant cabin, with four rooms on the floor, and eight up stairs, and a little place on the roof to smoke a pipe on, quite grand."

"That will do," said Mr. Field. "That will do, Dennis."

"Thank you, sir."

They all laughed at Dennis's stories of the potato, and Dick said to Claude in a whisper—

"It's of no use contending in lying with gentlemen of Dennis's country. They will beat you out of the field. But now, what do you advise us to do, and where are we to go, for the cattle want corn and water, and we want breakfast?"

"I think, if we could find some cottage where they would accommodate us, it would be better than going to an inn."

"That is a good thought. It would be much better if we could only find such a place as would suit us to go to; but there is the difficulty."

"It vanishes," said Claude, as he pointed to the top of a little cottage-chimney that rose up from amid a cluster of trees at a short distance to the right of the road-way. "The difficulty vanishes, for there is a cottage."

"Yes, there is a cottage, but you don't know exactly if there are the people in that cottage who will make us welcome."

"Certainly not; but we will try, at all events, if they will do so. They may, you know. But does this mode of proceeding meet with your approval, Mr. Field?"

"Whatever meets with yours will meet with mine," replied the young lover.

"And I beg to say," cried Dennis, "that, although discended from the ould kings of Ireland, and so entitled to a will of me own, I give in to you, jontilmen, entirely."

"We are very grateful," said Claude; "and so, now that that is settled, let us push on for the cottage. I must confess that the smoke rising from the chimney looks very inviting indeed."

A little turning of about eight or ten yards in length brought them to the door of the cottage, which was as pretty a one as anybody would wish to see.

There was a placard in the window, which went a long way towards justifying them in expecting that they would get every accommodation there that they required, for it announced that new milk and eggs were to be had within.

"This will do," said Claude. "If they sell milk and eggs here they will sell other things besides. The only doubt is concerning the cattle. But we can see about that."

Jack held Claude's horse while he dismounted, and entered the little garden that was in front of the cottage, and made his way up a gravelled walk to the door of the place. A neatly dressed young woman came out of the cottage and asked him what he wanted, upon which Claude said—

"We want some of the new milk and the eggs, and some fresh butter and bread, and, in fact, anything to eat and to drink that you may have in the place that is likely to be acceptable to hungry travellers, such as we really are."

"Then, gentlemen, you need breakfast?"

"I rather think we may say that we do."

"Walk in, sir. We shall be very happy to accommodate you; and if you will let my son, Benjamin, take the horses to the shed, he can attend to them likewise."

Claude was quite delighted to find that at this cottage they could get well accommodated, and he called to his friends to dismount and come into the garden. We need not pursue minutely all that Claude said, and all that the young woman said, and all that her son, Benjamin, who really looked much too old to be her son at all, did to make the horses comfortable. Let it suffice that in such peace and comfort as he, Claude, had not enjoyed for many a long day, he breakfasted with his friends at the cottage.

Mr. Field was very anxious to know what plan of operation Claude thought of adopting; and after a while, Claude said to him—

"The fact is, I feel in a little difficulty, for I have a letter which was taken from, or rather given up, by Mr. White, and which is addressed to the abbess of the convent; but it is sealed, and I have some scruple about opening it, although, I daresay, it contains information that would be very useful to us."

"Scruple!" cried Dick. "I have none."

"Well, then, do you open it, Dick."

"Stop!" said Jack. "We don't know yet but that such a letter may be useful in an evidential way; so don't destroy the seal of it, Dick, on any account."

"That is well thought of."

"But yet," interposed Claude, "I don't know whether we really ought to open the letter."

Mr. Field was silent, and Dick thought, as he had the letter in his hand, that it was incumbent upon him to say something concerning it.

"Let me," he said, "try what I can do to settle this question of gentlemanly morals as regards the opening another person's letter or not. Hem! In the first place, to open a letter not addressed to yourself, or even to read one that is open, and placed in your hands otherwise than in a fair way, is not only a breach of honour, but a signal guarantee of bad state."

"Granted," said Claude. "What else?"

"But——"

"Ah, there is always a but."

Dick laughed, as he proceeded.

"But when the opening of a letter, or even ten thousand letters—although that would be rather a long job, I admit, and one that I by no manner of means for myself desire—may have the effect of defeating some very great villany, I think that one is fairly justified in doing so, as in this instance."

"In that case, then, Dick, you think that the end sanctifies the act?"

"I do; but mind you, Claude, that is a specious doctrine that I by no means give way to on all occasions; but in this it holds good, as, after all, the act only consists of a breach of courtesy and good manners, and really inflicts no harm upon any one else."

"Bravo!" said Jack. "Very well argued, Dick."

"Thank you. Just put the blade of this knife into the fire, and let it get hot, if you please."

Jack nodded, and placed the blade of a small, thin knife that was upon the table between a couple of red-hot coals, and when it was tolerably hot, he carefully wiped it, and handed it to Dick, for he knew very well what he meant to do with it.

With great dexterity, then, Dick slipped the hot knife under the seal of the letter, and fairly cut it off, without in the smallest degree injuring the impression upon it.

"That will do," said Jack.

"Yes; and here is the letter open. Don't let the seal drop on to the floor, and we can easily fasten it on again when we have read this precious epistle to the Lady Abbess. Have you any objection, Claude?"

"None."

"Nor you, Mr. Field?"

"Oh, no. They say that in love, as in war, all is fair."

"So it is. Here goes, then.

"'Beloved mother—'

"The deuce! who does that mean?"

"It is the way that people who are high in the Catholic religion address the superiors of ecclesiastical establishments," said Mr. Field. "It is only a farce."

"Well, every one to his taste. 'Beloved mother,' it begins with. Sweet, certainly."

"But who is the writer of that letter?"

"We will soon see that."

Dick turned to the bottom of the page; and then he saw the name of John Beachem.

"It's the old rascal himself," he said—"it's Sir John Beachem who begins with, 'Beloved mother.'"

"That is the uncle, then, of my Alicia?"

"Good; and this letter, no doubt, contains the villanous and rascally instructions as to how the beloved mother is to force the young creature into a compliance with the designs of her charming relative."

"No doubt—no doubt."

"And yet," said Claude Duval, with indignation, "this is what they call a civilised country."

"But," said Jack; "the lord chancellor is the proper person to interfere in this matter, and, of course, he would."

"If he were forced to do so he would," said Mr. Field; "but not otherwise; for you must know that the lord chancellor dines with the Beachems, and that they helped him up the road to fortune; and that it is suspected that he has in secret professed the Catholic faith for the sake of getting business, when he was an attorney and a barrister, from the people of that persuasion."

CHAPTER CCCXXXVII.

THE ADVENTURERS FIND ADMISSION TO THE OLD PRIORY.

"Oh, what villany there is in this world!" said Claude, "when even those in the highest places are not exempt from such iniquities; but the time will surely come, when there will be greater purity among public men."

"I doubt it," said Dick. "But if you want to hear the letter read, attend at once, for I have got as yet no further than 'beloved mother.'"

"Go on—go on, Dick."

"'Beloved mother——'"

"Good gracious! don't say that again! The expression makes me quite ill," said Jack.

"'Beloved mother—The bearer of this epistle is one, who, albeit he is not, perhaps, exactly the sort of man with whom we should like to have much to do, is yet extremely useful in his vocation. He is a man who may be bought as you would buy any other commodity; and let the work be what it may that has to be done, this man will do it, provided you agree with him as to terms.

"'I need not, beloved and highly religious mother, expatiate upon the importance and the great benefit to be derived to the true faith from such an acquaintance.

"'The name of this person is Mr. White, and he is an attorney-at-law, and, therefore, quite competent to act in the little affair which has been entrusted to him.

"'He will place documents before Alicia to sign, which will have the effect of dividing her property equally between me and the blessed convent. I shall find many uses for my share, and the convent's, of course, will be divided between you and the beloved Father Garvey, the confessor.

"'And now, beloved mother, it is for you to adopt such means as may have the effect of forcing the rebellious girl, who might have obliged us very much by marrying Henry, to sign the papers that Mr. White will lay before her. Those means will be such as in your wisdom will be sufficient; and when she has signed these papers, it will be just as well that she should not go out into a sinful world again.

"'Beloved mother, I have no doubt that you perfectly comprehend your sincere friend,

"'JOHN BEACHEM.'

"That's all," said Dick.

After the reading of this precious epistle, the friends looked at each other, as well they might, with both surprise and indignation, for a more hypocritical, Jesuitical letter could not possibly have been indited

It was Mr. Field who broke the silence, and rising hastily, while a flush of colour spread itself over his face, he cried—

"The villain, John Beachem, would destroy Alicia entirely, if he could but force the signature he requires to the deed. Why, the letter first counsels coercion in obtaining that signature, and afterwards hints at her murder!"

"It is very like it," said Claude Duval. "But I pray you to be calm, sir."

"Calm! Can you or any man ask me to be calm, after listening to such an epistle?"

"Yes, for I can give you the best reason in the world why I ask you; and that is, that if you wish to save Alicia from her foes, it will only be by calmness and resolution. Violence ill-directed is sure to defeat itself. We will aid you; and, although I confess to feeling great indignation at such an epistle as this, yet I feel likewise that if I were to give way to its impulses, I should do no good in affair."

"You are right, sir—you are right. My judgment tells me that you are right, and I am thankful that I have one by me who can, and who will, step between me and my agitated spirit."

"Be satisfied, Mr. Field. This young lady shall be rescued."

"You promise me that?"

"Upon my faith I do."

"But—but, it may be too late."

"Not so. I think, if you consider for a minute or two, you will find that such cannot very well be the case. She is in the convent, no doubt, or this letter would not have been sent. Well, this letter has not yet been delivered, so that the lady abbess is waiting for the instructions that this letter gives to her; so it is quite clear that it is not too late."

"Oh, what a glorious hope!"

"Come, sir, you must calm your agitation, and we will all act together in such a measure as to insure success."

"But this lawyer—this villain, White?"

"What of him?"

"Why, he may go to the convent before us, or he may go back to Sir John Beachem, his base employer, and detail the loss of the letter, and then some urgent steps may be taken in the matter."

"You forget that White is at the old mill, and that the man Blue has promised that he will not let him go from it till he hears from me again; so that dread may be given up."

Mr. Field clasped his brow with his hands for a few moments, and then he said—

"Pardon me, my dear and kind friend, but really, the shock that that wicked and detestable letter gave to me, drove from my thoughts what I ought to have recollected. I now have a perfect recollection of what you tell me, and I know that you are saying all for the best. I hope that you will not feel any way hurt at what I may say in the agony of my spirit."

"Not in the least. I can feel for you fully, and I know that were I in your case, that I should find it quite as difficult as you find it to preserve anything like calmness and serenity, under the painful circumstances."

"Now, then," said Dick, "what is to be done with the letter?"

"It merits dertruction," said Mr. Field.

"No," said Jack. "Take care of it, I beg of you."

"Care of such an epistle as that?"

"Yes. Is it not the passport to the convent?"

"Ah, yes. It is—it is."

"Then, I say, take care of it, and do you, Dick, fix the seal again, so that it shall not to a cursory observer have the appearance of having been at all tampered with, and, no doubt, we shall find that letter of the greatest possible use in the matter that we are all so willing to undertake and to carry out to the best of our abilities."

Dick upon this warmed the wax again and replaced the seal so neatly, that it would have taken a far more minute observation than any one usually bestows upon the fastening of a letter, unless there is some object in a close scrutiny, to divine that it had been touched.

"That will do," said Dick.

"Capital," said Claude.

"Listen to me," said Mr. Field. "I beg of you to give me that letter."

"For what purpose?"

"I will go with it to the convent gate—the production of it will at once enable me to enter the building; and then, in the face of all opposition, I will carry off Alicia."

"Very romantic," said Jack.

"And very bold," said Dick.

"And very imprudent," said Claude.

"How so?—I would ask how so? The boldest mode of proceeding is in most cases the best. I pray you to allow me to go at once and try what I can do. Give me the letter."

"Mr. Field," said Claude Duval, "this is your affair, and you are certainly entitled to the letter, if you like."

"Thank you—thank you!"

"But if you will be advised by one who looks upon this matter with a calmer judgment than you can possibly bring to bear upon it, you will not be so hasty, but adopt a course of conduct more likely to conduce to a pleasant result. Will you listen to me?"

"Yes—yes."

"Then I counsel that we wait till the darkness of the evening, and then that I go to the convent with the letter. I will personate Mr. White, and you shall go with me as my clerk. By such a mode of proceeding we shall find out where Alicia is hidden."

"Hidden, say you?"

"Yes. You do not fancy that you would find her in the intricacies of such a place as that by going in and in a loud voice demanding her? Believe me, no. They would baffle you in that mode of proceeding, you may depend; and after a vain search, during which you would incur, perhaps, very great personal risk from treachery, you would have to leave the convent again, with the certainty that before you could get back to it she might be disposed of."

"And then again, if you were to apply to the law to aid you," said Dick, "I don't think you would be any the better off, for, after all, you are not the young lady's guardian, and Sir John Beachem, it appears, is; and she is, you say, still a little under age, and, if ever so little, she remains the ward of her uncle, and so to a certain extent, at all events, amenable to his authority."

"Ah," added Duval, "and while all that was being settled, and the semblance of an interference was being canvassed in the court of chancery, all that we dread would be accomplished."

Mr. Field looked from one to the other in dismay, and then clasping his hands he said—

"My good friends, do with me as you will—make your own arrangements—heed me not, but just tell me what I shall do, and I will do it to the best of my ability. I assure you—I resign myself, in this affair, entirely into your hands."

"Very good," said Duval. "I don't think you can do a wiser thing. The object will be to find out where Alicia is imprisoned in the convent, and then to save her. But, as yet, it is impossible that we can say what force they may not have there to resist us, and, I fancy, you would rather get her away quietly than with a riot."

"Oh, yes—yes."

"Very good; we will manage all that for you; and when you have a husband's right, you can defy your foes as much as you like."

Young Field was quite convinced that what Claude Duval advised in the matter was the most prudent course to adopt; so it was fully agreed upon, and all they had to do was to dispose of themselves in the best way they could till the evening.

A whispered consultation took place between the highwaymen; and then Claude, turning to Field, said—

"Sir, we will meet you at the cottage at sunset; till then we have some business to transact."

"Be it so—you will not fail me?"

"If we are alive we shall be here."

"I, then, will go to London, and make such arrangements for the reception of Alicia with a female relative of mine, as shall insure to her protection and comfort at once when she is rescued from the convent."

"You had better, too," said Dick, "have a coach in waiting on the Acton-road, with a man upon whom you can depend, for it will be desirable to get the young lady away with all the speed possible, when once we have got her clear of the convent walls."

"I will—I will."

"Till night, then," said Claude, "farewell."

They all three shook hands with young John Field, and he went towards London, while Claude Duval, after having liberally paid for what they had had at the cottage, mounted his horse, and with Dick and Jack took to the road. It was about ten o'clock in the morning then, and by no means the most favourable time for gentlemen of their profession to exercise their calling; but, the fact is, that after a brief conference as to their resources, they found that they were getting very short of money, and that it was necessary, as Dick said, to transact a little professional business for the sake of replenishing their purses.

"We are rather in strength," said Dick, "and so I don't see what is to hinder us from taking toll upon this road. Of course, we can pick and choose by the broad daylight our customers."

"Yes," said Claude, "we can do that certainly; but yet it is rather contrary to the ordinary practice to cry, 'Stand!' to a traveller on the highway in broad daylight; but if there be a necessity for it, why, I will not say nay to it."

"I tell you what we can do," said Jack.

"What now?"

"Why, about a couple of miles further on there is quite a thick little wood, and if we ensconce ourselves among the trees in it, we shall see whoever comes down the road, and can either keep snug or sally out, according as we shall think proper. The wood, too, is on both sides of the way, so we can baffle any one who may come to look after us, by crossing from one side to the other."

"Be it so. Come on, then, at once."

A sharp trot soon brought them to the wood, if wood it could be called, for, after all, it was but an artificial plantation, which, owing to the estate to which it belonged being unoccupied, had been allowed to grow to a wild state, which would have been prevented had it been in careful hands. It was quite thick enough, though, to afford a good shelter to man and horse.

CHAPTER CCCXXXVIII.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS ESTABLISH A TOLL IN THE HIGH WESTERN ROAD.

"WHICH is it to be, to begin with," said Claude. "The right or the left sid of the road?"

"This way," said Jack, and he plunged into the plantation on the left. They both followed him.

The road which led to Brentford was very narrow at that point, and the plantation on each side was only divided from it by a bank which was not above four feet high, so that the horse had stepped over it with all the ease possible. The trees close to the road-side, from getting more light and air there than in more confined situations, had grown very tall and robust, and in some cases had shot out branches that nearly crossed the road.

Under these circumstances, that bit of roadway was rather in the dark, and was perpetually crossed by masses of shadow, through which only at times a bright bit of sunlight, when that luminary was high in the heavens, would find its way, and lie upon the road like a sheet of molten gold.

It was a sweet spot, for the soft air that blew from tree to tree carried upon its invisible wings the odours of fair flowers; and the birds carolled from branch to branch of the trees, as though they considered that spot specially devoted to them, and to be one where they could enjoy life and liberty, free from the danger of molestation, to which they were ordinarily subject.

The three highwaymen dismounted, and looked about them a little; and then Dick said—

"This is 'under the greenwood tree,' in the full acceptation of the words, I rather think, Claude. But which of us is to sally out, and cry 'Stand!' to the first traveller who passes?"

"You," said Jack; "and there he is."

Dick gave a start, and glancing out into the road-way, he saw a quiet, gentlemanly-looking elderly man, mounted upon a short-legged pony, or cob, with a flowing mane and tail, and who, as well as his master, seemed intent upon looking about him, and enjoying the quiet gloom-like aspect of the scene.

"Shall I go?" said Dick.

"Yes," said Claude, "and I will take the next."

"Very good."

Dick sprang into the saddle, and quietly trotted out of the wood into the road. The old gentleman started at the sight of him, and surveyed him from top to toe in silence.

"A fine day, sir," said Dick.

"It is," said the old gentleman. "Good morning, sir."

Slightly touching his hat, the old gentleman would now have passed on; but Dick placed himself across the road, saying as he did so—

"I am sorry to interrupt you, sir; but if you will have the kindness to hand me out your watch and purse, if you have one, I shall be obliged."

THE APPARITION IN THE HAUNTED MILL.

The old gentleman uttered a deep-drawn sigh.

"You are a highwayman?" he said.

"Just so," said Dick.

"Well, I have the sum of thirty-six guineas here in a little leathern bag; but they are not mine."

"Exactly," said Dick; "from the moment that I saw you, they became, in a manner of speaking, mine."

"Hear me, sir."

"Go on, then; but don't be prosy, for I have no time to spare."

"The money I have named to you belongs to a poor widow, who, if it be not paid within this day, will, with her young children, be turned out of her house destitute. It is a whole year's rent, which I am taking to her landlord. It has been raised by—by"—the old man's voice faltered as he spoke, and tears gathered to his eyes—"by subscriptions, the amount of any of which has not exceeded one shilling. I—am the curate of this parish, with a stipend of forty pounds per annum, and eight children to support out of it."

Dick looked down, as he said in a low tone—

"Is all that true, sir?"

"So help me Heaven, it is!"

"Where is the bag and the money?"

"Oh, God! he will take it—he will take it! Here it is! Young man, for you are young in comparison to me, may Heaven pardon you for this grievous sin!"

Dick took the bag, and opened it. Then diving his hand into his pocket, he took out all the gold he had, which amounted to thirteen guineas, and poured it into the bag, on top of the amount that was already there. Then handing the bag back to the astonished curate, he said—

"Take it, sir, and forget that you ever met me."

"Good God!"

"Go, sir—go."

"But—but—What is the meaning of this?"

"If, sir, you find, when you empty that bag before the landlord, there is any overplus, take it back to the widow and the children. Good morning, sir."

Dick would have turned away; but the old clergyman rode up to him, and laid his hand upon his arm, as he said—

"Your name! Who are you?"

"You had better not know, sir."

"Oh, yes—yes, I beg that you will tell me who you are. You may be some one with whom, at another time, I may be able to communicate. Who shall say that I may not save you from continuing this course of life?"

"That's a vain hope, sir, although I thank you for the expression of it; and if you will know my name, you shall."

"I want to hear it."

"Richard Turpin!"

"Turpin? Is this possible?"

"It is true, sir."

"Why, report has painted you as one who never knew pity—as one of the most reckless and heartless of men—as an individual who was to be dreaded—as a pest to society; but I find you with a feeling heart, despite all your errors."

"It won't do to believe report, sir, too implicitly, either for good or for evil; but now that you know who I am, you perceive how completely out of the question it is that I should be other than what I am."

"Alas!—alas! I am afraid——"

"That it is so, you would say, and you are right, sir. It is so, without a doubt; and so, once again farewell."

Without waiting for another word from the old curate, Dick Turpin now turned his horse's head towards the wood again; and, bounding over the little bank, he disappeared among the trees.

The clergyman, after a pause of a few moments, rode on with the little canvas bag of money in his hand, apparently unconscious that he so held it, so deeply was he in thought concerning the strange encounter he had had with Dick Turpin, the highwayman.

When Dick got back to his friends, Claude said—

"Well, Dick, what luck?"

"Oh, stunning luck," said Dick.

"That's right. How much did you get, old friend?"

"Why, I tell you what it is, Claude, if we go on in the way that I have begun, we may as well shut up shop, and go into some other business. When we, a little time ago, compared our resources, I believe I had the greatest amount; but now I am quite sure I have the least."

"You speak in riddles, Dick.

"Or else he caught a tartar," said Jack, "and has been robbed himself instead of robbing the traveller."

Dick laughed.

"I did," he said, "in one sense, catch a tartar, as you say, Jack; and the traveller has gone off with all the gold I had, instead of surrendering all that he had; although I admit that I held his gold in my hand for a moment or two."

Jack looked amazed; but Claude said, very gently—

"I am quite sure that Dick had some good and sufficient reason for acting as he has done; and so, for one, I am satisfied."

"I had a reason," said Dick; "and I will tell it to you both with pleasure."

Dick then related exactly what had occurred; and when he had concluded, both Claude and Jack applauded him for the manner in which he had acted; and it is no stretch of truth to say, that they were much better pleased than as if he had brought to them the canvas bag of the poor widow, with her rent in it.

"Here you are," said Jack, suddenly.

"Where—where?"

"A gig! Now, Claude."

They both looked into the road, and then they saw two persons in a gig; and it so happened that the horse, when he got to that shady place, either thought that it would be a nice place to come to a short halt in, or was alarmed at the sudden change from the sunshine to that place, for he came to a halt; and when the man who was driving tried to whip him on, he stood upon his hind legs, and very nearly sent both the persons in the vehicle out at the back.

Those persons consisted of a man and a woman, both very much overdressed; and, by the vulgarity of their appearance, evidently people into whose laps fortune had fallen, without any effort or exertion of theirs in the least.

"Stop him!" cried the female. "Oh, stop him, do!"

"Woa!" said the man. "Woa!"

The horse, when he found that all that was required of him was to be quiet, stood still enough, and only whisked his tail about in defiance of the flies, that would annoy him if they could.

"Jack," said Claude, "Providence has made these two people a present to you."

"To me?"

"Yes; this is your adventure. Be quick about it, or they will go on. Come, now, Jack, these are folks that you can ease of their ready money, without having any scruples. So, go at once, that's a good fellow."

"But I though that you———"

"No—no."

"Oh, very good. I cannot possibly have any objection. It's all in the way of business. So, here goes."

Jack made his horse bound over the bank, and in a moment was by the side of the gig, to the no small consternation of the man and woman who were in it, and who glanced at him in evident alarm. The man spoke first, saying—

"Who are you, sir? I—I should like to know who you are?"

"So should I, indeed," said the woman, making a great rustling with the vulgar finery of her apparel.

"A highwayman!" roared Jack, in a loud voice; "and if you don't at once give up your money and valuables, I'll blow both your brains out, if you have any, with all the pleasure in the world."

The woman screamed, and the man opened his mouth and eyes so wide, that it seemed doubtful if they would ever shut properly again.

"Quick!" cried Jack. "Your money and jewellery! Quick, I say!"

"Oh, Lord!"

"You can say your prayers when you get home," added Jack. "There is no time for them now."

"You wretch!" said the woman, "do you know who I am?"

"No; nor I don't care."

"Then, I can tell you that my husband here is a gentleman—quite a gentleman. He is a clerk."

"In the law," stammered the man. "I am a lawyer's clerk, if you please. But I am very well off—that is, I—oh, dear! I am the attorney-general's principal flunkey—no, I mean the attorney—that is to say, clerk. Spare my watch, and take my life. The gig is only hired, I assure you, sir, if you please; and all I have had to-day is a glass of sherry, that my doctor has tasted first, to see that it ain't poisonous to my constitution, sir, indeed."

"Yes," said the woman; "but Mr. Day is highly respectable, and was brought up at one of the first charity schools in the city of London."

"Your money," roared Jack.

"Oh, give it to him—give it to the wretch, do."

Mr. Day handed to Jack a well filled purse, and then Jack said, "Is that watch you have gold or silver?"

"Listen, if you please, sir. You see, we flunkies of the law have to carry our master's wig box to Westminster every day, and if we are not in time, oh, don't we catch it! So don't take the watch. Oh, dear!"

"My dear," said the woman, "you are quite the gentleman, you know."

"Yes, oh, yes, I am—I am. I think I am—eh? Oh, there's somebody coming. Oh, you rascal! I'll have you taken up."

Jack looked along the road, and saw a couple of men on horseback coming forward at a trot.

"Hark you," said Jack, as he took a small pistol from his pocket, "I can easily hold this pistol in my hand in such a way, that with my finger on the trigger, I can fire at any moment, and yet I can cover it with the cuff of my coat from observation. Now, if you give the least alarm to these two men who are advancing, I will send a bullet into your skull."

"Oh—oh!"

"It's of no use your saying, oh! but I will do it. Your best plan is to answer me quite civilly what I shall ask of you, in the hearing of these two men who are now approaching."

CHAPTER CCCXXXIX.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS STOP A STAGE-COACH AND CARRY IT OFF.

From where they were situated in the wood, neither Claude Duval nor Dick Turpin could see the two mounted men who were advancing on the road, and who would soon be upon the scene of action. If they had seen them the probability is, that, without considering whether it it would be best to do so or not, they would have sallied out, fearing that Jack would be in serious danger.

It they had done so, a melee, in the course of which bloodshed would have been certain, would have taken place, and that was a state of things they were always desirous to avoid.

Jack, too, was well aware that he might have summoned his two friends to his aid easily enough, but he thought it better to succeed in surmounting the danger that threatened by finesse than by force.

The two men were well mounted, and by the appearance of the saddles of their steeds, Jack's experienced eye could very well guess that they had holsters and pistols at hand.

"Well, my dear fellow," said Jack, in a loud voice, as the men came up, addressing Mr. Day in the gig, "it's very kind of you to be so pressing in your kind invitation, and I will certainly endeavour to call upon you the very first opportunity."

"Do so," said Mr. Day, faintly.

"Come, madam," said Jack in an under tone, "say something."

"Perhaps," said Mrs. Day, "you would be kind enough to come to luncheon at our house in town, Mr. a—a—"

"Smith," said Jack.

"Mr. Smith?"

"Confound her," muttered Mr. Day, "she always asks men to luncheon when she knows that I can't get away from the chambers at Lincoln's Inn. What can she do that for, I wonder?"

The two horsemen reached the spot, and one of them said—

"Have you seen any suspicious characters on this road?"

"Keep off," cried Jack. "We don't intend to let ourselves be robbed, I can tell you. Keep off!"

"Why, who do you take us for?"

"Oh, I don't know, but the fact is, we have heard that there are highwaymen upon this road."

"Then you have heard right; but we are police-officers."

"Are you sure of that?"

"Look at our waiscoats—don't you see they are red? If you want any further proof, we will show you our constable's staffs."

"Oh, what a relief," said Jack. "My friends here really were afraid of being robbed, just now."

"We was indeed," said the lady, in defiance of grammar.

"You need be under no apprehension now," said the two officers. "We are in advance of a party that will, I hope, before nightfall clear the road of these rascals, that we hear upon good authority are upon it. There is a capital reward offered for them."

"How much?" said Jack.

"Why, there's as good as a thousand pounds, one way and another, for the whole three."

"You don't say so! Well, don't I wish that I could meet with them. But, however, it's no use getting one's brains blown out even for a thousand pounds, is it, Mr. Day?"

"No—no—no!" shouted the man in the gig.

"But, it is a large sum," said the lady.

"Yes, my dear friend," said Jack; "but I feel quite certain that the highwaymen would shoot even you, if they thought that they were in any danger from your dear delightful tongue wagging too freely."

"They would," said one of the officers.

The lady shrunk back in the gig, for she just saw the muzzle of the small pistol that Jack had in his hand, and she fully believed that he would not be very particular whether he sent the bullet into her head, or that of her husband.

"Well, we have no time to spare," said the officer who was the spokesman of the two. "You had better look sharp, if you want to avoid the rascals, for they will be sure to stop you and rob you."

"I should resist them," said Jack.

"You would be foolish to do so, sir," said the officer, "for you would be sure to get a bullet for doing so. No, sir, keep out of their way, if you can; but if they do stop you, resistance is foolish with such fellows. They have everything to gain by shooting you, and nothing to lose."

It was a curious fact at the time when the roads round London were quite infested by highwaymen that the police were always advising people not to resist them, but to let themselves be robbed quietly; and no doubt that arose from several considerations. In the first place, the police by no means wished that the public should cut short the career of the highwaymen; and, in the second, they considered it an interference with, and an infringment upon, their own professional pursuits for any one to contend with a highwayman, as they were sure to reap both profit and importance for the capture of one.

It so happened, though, in the present instance, that it suited Jack admirably that the officers should give this advice, as it thoroughly completed the alarm of the two persons in the gig.

The officers then rode off without the least suspicion that it was Sixteen-string Jack they had been talking to, for one of them had happened to know by sight the man in the gig; and knowing that he held a kind of law official situation about one of the courts of law, he took for granted that all was right with one who appeared to be travelling on the road with him.

"Well, this is truly dreadful!" said the lady.

"Did you speak, madam?" said Jack.

"I did, you wretch!"

"Thank you, madam."

"Oh, you needn't thank me. I think you the most odious, and the most ugly, and the most horrid wretch, I ever saw."

"You don't say so?"

"I do say so!" screamed the lady.

"There you go again," said her husband. "When you do begin, upon my life you are quite a—a—Oh, dear!"

"I don't see," said Jack, "that any one has a right to complain. The fact is, as far as I am concerned in the matter, if the lady, or female more properly speaking, had fancied me as she does you, I should have begun to ask myself what was amiss in my appearance or conduct to bring me under such a stigma; but as she abuses me, of course that is to my mind the most complimentary course she could possibly adopt in reference to me."

"Ah! Oh, dear! Well, I suppose we may go on, now," said Mr. Day. "I beg, sir, to assure you that you have got all the money I had about me, except what will be barely sufficient to pay the tolls. And so, sir, if you please, I should very much like to say good morning to you."

"Good morning," said Jack, with a smile; "but just for the present I object to your going in this direction."

"What, not as we were going?"

"Certainly not. I have a very particular objection."

"Oh, dear! then we shall have to go back to town, I suppose?"

"I rather think you will; and as you have been so polite as to hand to me your purse without much trouble, I will give you a pass-word, which will save you from being stopped by any of my friends on the road."

"Thank you—thank you. Oh, dear!"

"Very good. When you, then, see any one on horseback approaching you, you will at once pull up and call out 'Bones and blood!'"

"Oh, gracious!" cried the lady, "I couldn't do it."

"It is the only thing that will save you," added Jack, with all the gravity in the world, for he was resolved to let the couple in the chaise into a row on the route back to town, if he could—"it is the only way by which you may save your lives."

"That is something," said Mr. Day. "My precious life is everything."

"Oh, stuff!" said his wife.

"It's all very well for you to say stuff, because you want to marry again, and spend my money; but I have a different opinion, and I will say 'Bones and blood!' to everybody who looks at me as we go home, for home we will go, I suppose, now? It is quite clear that this highwayman—I mean, this gentleman, don't want us to go on this road any further."

"Yes," said the lady, with acrimony, "and that is for fear we should come up with the two constables who have passed us."

"Madam," said Jack, "you have got it there. I admire your discrimination. Now, sir, be off, if you please."

Jack pointed the pistol at the head of Mr. Day, who, looking upon that as a good hint to depart at once, turned the horse's head towards town, and set off at a trot, repeating to himself as he did so—

"Blood and bones!' Oh, dear, no, it was 'Bones and blood!' I wouldn't forget it for the world. 'Bones and blood!' What a dreadful pass-word! But still if it answers, it will be all right."

Jack trotted back to his friends.

"Well," said Claude, "what luck?"

"All's right," said Jack. "I have done better than Dick in his adventure."

"Nay, excuse me," said Dick, "I don't think you have, for my adventure has pleased me more than a great booty would have done. We can always take, but it is not always that we find so good an opportunity of giving as I had."

"You are quite right, Dick. I admit fully the truth of what you say; but here is a tolerably well-filled purse, at all events, and one comfort is, that it comes from a quarter that can very well afford to lose it."

Claude just opened the purse, and saw that it was gold that it contained, and then he gave it back to Jack, who, however, said—

"Do you keep it, Claude."

"No. It is my turn to stop the next passenger on the road, and so I ought not to be the treasurer, in case anything should happen amiss to me, for in that case you would lose both me and the money. You keep it yourself, Jack."

"Very well; but if anything was to happen to you, Claude, I would just as soon let the money go as well."

"So would I," said Dick; "but as it is Claude's turn to stop the next affair on the road, I think he will have a job, for it is a stage-coach."

"The deuce it is?"

"Behold it coming."

Claude raised himself up in his stirrups a little, and there, sure enough, he saw approaching the spot a stage-coach, with four horses, and coming along at very tolerable speed.

"Now, Claude," said Dick. "Sally out. It's your turn now."

"Stop—stop!" cried Jack, "this won't do!"

Dick laughed, and so did Claude, and then the latter said—

"Well, it is rather an awkward thing for one man to stop a coach with four horses, even at night, when the uncertainty as to whether he has comrades near at hand or not adds to the alarm of the passengers; but in broad daylight, when there is no sort of difficulty in seeing that he is alone, it is ten times worse; so I decline."

"Of course," said Jack.

"But we can all do it," said Dick.

Jack looked rather thoughtful, but Claude rode to the top of the bank and took a long look around him, and then he said—

"Well, I don't see why we should not. The road is uncommonly clear just now. Ten minutes will do the job, and, really, I do not see that we need shrink from it, as there are three of us."

"Agreed," said Dick.

"Well, but," said Jack, "I think——"

"Jack, if you have any objection," said Claude, "I will give it up. It shall not be said that I drew you into an adventure of this kind against your own will and judgment."

"Come on, then," said Jack, "I have no objection; and there is no time to argue the matter. I will stop the leading horses, and keep the coachman quiet, while you and Dick do the rest of the business."

"Agreed. Come on."

They all three at once, now, dashed into the road, just as the coach was about a hundred yards from the spot where they emerged from the little wood. Jack placed himself in the middle of the road, with his face towards the advancing vehicle; and Claude and Dick took up each of them a position on each side of the road, so that when the coach should reach that spot, it would be hemmed in. The natural result of this state of things was, that the coachman took the alarm, and gradually pulled up his horses, so that, without at all intending to do so, he really assisted the highwaymen in the attack upon him and his passengers.

"Here's a dozen highwaymen, at least!" he called out. "We shall all be murdered, as safe as a gun!"

Some ladies in the inside of the coach began to scream; and the commotion among the half-dozen outside passengers was immense, as Jack seized, with his left hand, the head of one of the leading horses, and called out—

"Coachman, if you don't want a couple of slugs through your head, you will keep your cattle quiet and well in hand."

CHAPTER CCCXL.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS FIND THEMSELVES IN POSSESSION OF RATHER A LARGE BOOTY.

"Oh, lor!—oh, lor!" said the coachman, as he dropped his whip. "I am as good—I mean as bad as a dead man!"

"Be quiet, all of you," said Claude, in a clear, distinct voice—"be quiet, and make no resistance, and there will be no danger. It neither suits our objects nor our disposition to hurt a hair of any one's head if we are not provoked to do it."

One of the outside passengers began hurriedly to descend; but Claude rode up close to the coach, and placing the muzzle of a pistol against his cheek, said quietly—

"Allow me to request you, sir, to resume and keep your seat, or I shall have to waste a charge of gunpowder upon you very unwillingly."

With a face as pale as death, the passenger scrambled back into his seat again, and sat there shaking like a piece of jelly.

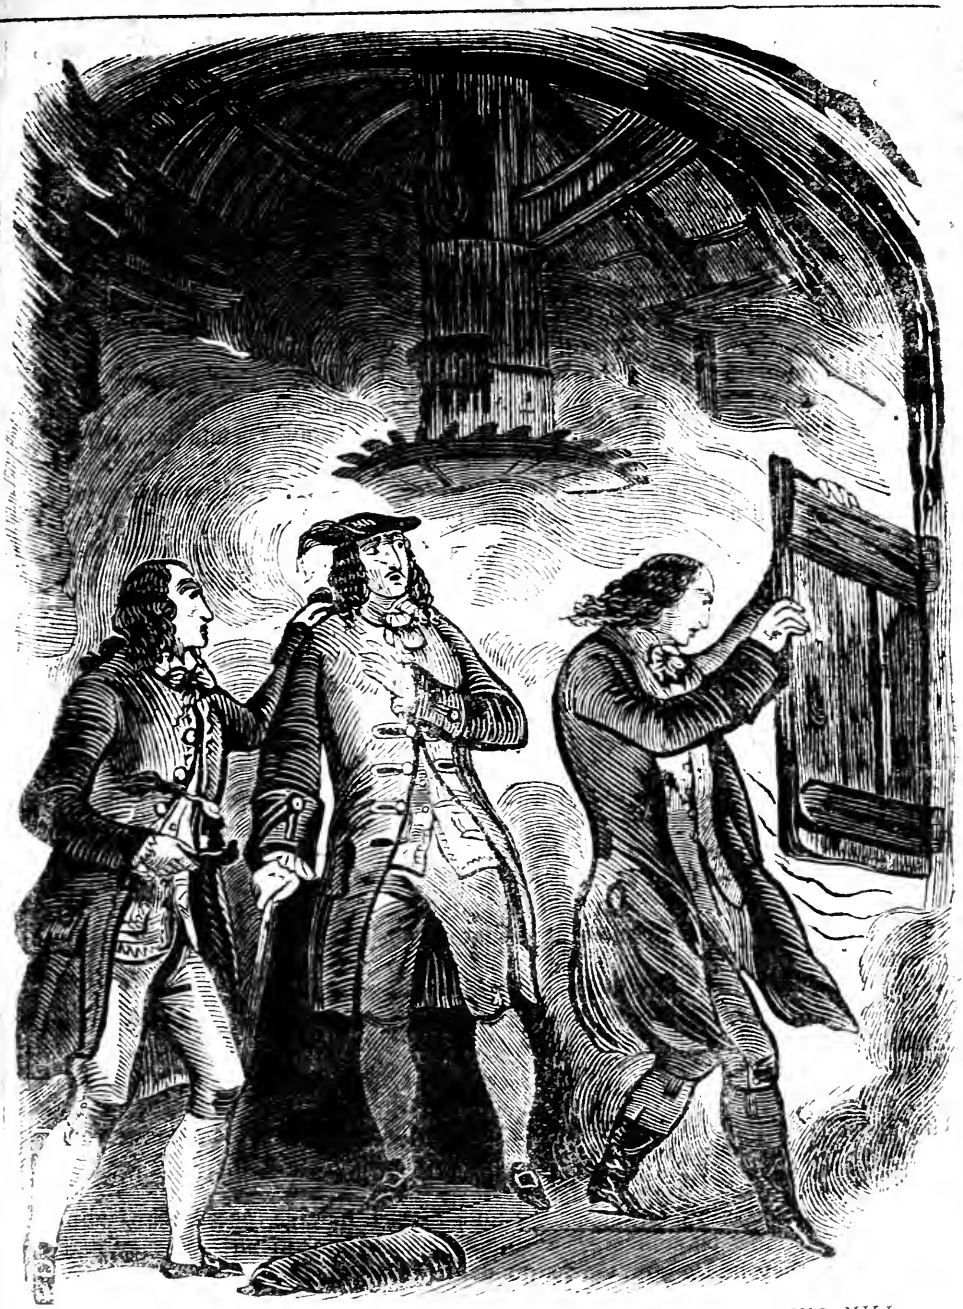
By this time Dick had let down the glass on the side of the coach next to him; and he gave three raps upon the edge of the window with the barrel of a pistol, and then he said—

"Ladies and gentlemen, I will thank you for your money, watches, rings, and any other little articles of portable value that you may have about you. The ladies may retain their ear-rings, as it is sometimes inconvenient to take them out; but if there is any trouble with any gentleman, we always find that the shortest plan of operation is to send a bullet into him."

There were four ladies and two gentlemen inside the coach; and the four ladies uttered four screams, as Dick finished his speech, and the two gentlemen swore dreadfully to themselves; but they took good care, for all that, to get their purses out of their pockets.

"Silence, ladies," said Dick.

"Oh, dear, yes!" said one, "we are silent, I assure you, good Mr. Robber. I swear to you that I have got no money!"



"Very good, madam; then of course you cannot give me any. I don't do the searching business. There is one of my comrades, a black man, who does that, so I shall have to hand you over to him."

"Oh, gracious! there's my purse!"

"Thank you, madam."

"And there's mine!"—"And mine!"—"That is all my cash!"—"I hope you will let me keep my watch?"—"Oh, you don't want my wedding-ring, surely? I have no more than what I now hand to you."—"D—n it! there ought to be a guard to this coach!"

Such were a few of the expressions of the inside passengers, as they handed to Dick the property he demanded of them; and then a young lady, who sat in a corner, said—

THE THREE FRIENDS ESCAPING TO THE ROOF OF THE BURNING MILL.

"Mr. Highwayman, I don't like to give you my purse, for it has only got five guineas in it, and my uncle gave them to me; and they are all I shall have for three months for pocket money."

"My dear," said Dick, "don't mention it; keep them, by all means."

"Oh, thank you."

"Well, I'm sure!" said a rather corpulent old lady, "that is always the way with men. They are ready to let children have their own way in everything. I don't see why we should all be robbed, and an infant, who cannot have long got out of the nursery, should escape."

"I am seventeen, madam, if you please," said the young lady. "Nursery, indeed! I hate the nursery."

"Sir," said one of the gentlemen, "I trust you will have the kindness to return to me my watch, as you seem a civil sort of a ras—I mean person, for I set some value upon it, I assure you."

"Do you, indeed, sir? Does it go well?"

"It does."

"Very good; then it will go from you as well as it used with you. And now, ladies and gentlemen, I make no doubt in the world but that I have been in this affair most atrociously swindled."

"Swindled?" said the old lady. "Oh, dear! what does the man mean by that?"

"Just this, madam: that I think, and, in fact, I may say that I know, I am atrociously swindled, and that you have not handed me, any of you, above one half of the property you have about you; but I and my friends do business in that liberal kind of way that we allow you to cheat us."

"Allow us to cheat you?" said one of the gentlemen. "Upon my word, that is about as cool a thing as I ever heard of."

"You should always be cool, sir," said Turpin; "for let you be transacting what business you may, you are sure to get through it better by coolness than by being in a flurry."

With these words, Turpin drew up the window again, and was turning off from the side of the coach, when a loud crack came upon his ears, and his hat flew off his head in a moment, while the report of a pistol rang in his ears.

"What's that?" cried Claude Duval.

"All's right," said Dick, as he coolly turned to the coach again, and let down the glass.

The passengers were all looking as pale as death itself, and one of the gentlemen had his lips so compressed, that every particle of colour had left them. Dick pointed to him, as he said, slowly and deliberately—

"It was you, sir, who fired at me!"

They were all silent.

"I say, sir, it was you who committed that cowardly act, for it was cowardly in the extreme."

"What is it?" said Claude, as he galloped to the spot.

"Nothing—nothing. Look to the outside, Claude. I will manage this gentleman."

"You are not hit?"

"Oh, no."

"That is well. All is right, if that is the case, and I know I can leave you to manage your own affairs."

"Thank you, Claude."

Duval had been receiving the contributions of the outside passengers, who had given them, it must be confessed, with rather a bad grace; but still they had given them, and they had amounted to a considerable sum in all.

The gentleman who had fired at Dick Turpin in what we cannot help calling rather a treacherous and cowardly manner, was evidently too much terrified to speak. He only sat glaring at the highwayman, and with a dreamy kind of wonder in his mind as to what he would do next.

"Sir," said Dick, and he spoke with rather startling coolness and determination. "Sir, if, when first I came to this window, you had in a bold and straightforward manner, as you might have done and as you would have been fully justified in doing, resisted me, I should have thought nothing of it; but, on the contrary, you waited until I was off my guard, and for the mere purpose of petty revenge, because I had taken from you a few pounds, you fired at me, and that in the most treacherous manner that you could possibly do it in. Sir, if I were an angry man——"

"Oh, spare him," said the young lady. "Don't kill him."

"That is not my intention," said Dick. "I say, if I were an angry man I should this moment shoot you through the head, as I might do by the least pressure of my little finger upon the trigger of this pistol."

As he spoke, Dick held the pistol muzzle within a couple of inches of the gentleman's head.

"Spare him—spare him!" said the young lady. "I entreat you to do so."

"I will; it would be murder to shoot him now."

"This generosity will meet with its reward," said the young lady. "You may be assured, sir, that it will."

The gentleman now, if he might really be called such, upon finding that Dick Turpin had not the intention to kill him for the attempt that had been made upon his life, gathered courage to speak.

"I am glad I missed you," he said.

"No, sir, you are not."

"Well, a man has a right to defend his property."

"Yes, in a manly manner, but you, sir, have the mind of an assassin, as you sufficiently exemplified by the mode in which you sought your revenge. You did not attempt to defend your property, but you gave that up through fear, and then you sought to assassinate the man you dared not face."

"Oh, nonsense! I fired at you, as I should have been quite willing to have done before, only I could not get at my pistols. I did not want to take any unfair advantage of you."

"Then you mean to tell me that you are the sort of man who would like a fair shot at such as I am?"

"Yes, I am; but it is all over now, and I make you welcome to what you have taken from me. Good morning. Ha! ha!"

There was quite as much nervous excitement as a kind of foolish recklessness in this mode of speaking of the gentleman; but he had no idea that Dick meant to take him at his word.

"Well, sir," said Dick, "I am one who will oblige you or anybody if it be in my power. I will forget the unfair shot that you have had at me, and you shall have a fair one."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean, that you shall get out of the coach and have another shot at me in a fair and open manly manner, and I will have one at you."

"Oh, no—no!"

"But I say, oh, yes—yes."

"I am quite satisfied. I don't want to have anything more to say in the affair or to do with it, I assure you. I am quite satisfied, sir, and you are welcome to what you have got."

"But I am not satisfied, and out you shall come. Claude—Claude!"

"Here," said Duval; "what is it?"

"This fellow wants a fair shot at me, and I am determined to let him have it, and now he shrinks from it. Help me to get him out of the coach, Claude, so that he may be satisfied, in spite of himself."

"Come, sir," said Claude, as he reached in his arm and seized the man by the collar and had him out in a moment. "This is the way, if you please."

"Murder!" said the old lady.

"It might have been murder," said the young one. "Pray, sir, are you Claude Duval, the highwayman?"

"Yes, my dear."

"Oh, I have so wanted to see you!"

"Take a good look at me, then. I cannot say that I have so wanted to see you, for I did not know of your fair existence; but when I do look at you, I esteem myself very fortunate in having that pleasure."

"You are a wretch!" said the old lady. "Go away, do."

"But is she not a pretty girl, madam?" said Claude.

"No!"

"Oh, how can you say that? Ha! ha! Now, Dick, where is your man? Oh, here he is. Well, sir, so you tried one shot at my friend, and now you object to treat us to another?"

"Spare my life!"

"What a coward!"

"Yes," said Dick; "but I don't intend to let him off on that score, for a coward is, after all, a far more dangerous animal than a brave man. I know, sir, that you have another pistol, so you can produce it; and as the one you fired was well loaded, as I may judge by the report, the other is, no doubt, in quite as satisfactory a condition. This is a duel, Claude; will you see fair play?"

"I will, Dick."

"One—two—three—four—five—six—seven—eight—nine—ten—eleven—twelve paces," said Turpin, as he stepped them out upon the side of the road, and then faced his antagonist. "Now, sir."

The man dropped to his knees, and in a very abject manner, cried out—

"Spare my life—oh, spare my life! There was no bullet in the pistol."

"Lie the first," said Dick.

"And I didn't mean to hit you."

"Lie the second."

"And I have no other pistol about me, I declare to you."

"Lie the third."

"Oh, it is true—it is true; and if you fire at me, you will be firing at an unarmed man."

"What's this?" said Claude, as he dived his hand into one of the coat skirt-pockets of the man, and brought out a very beautifully made pistol. "What is this?"

"Oh—oh—oh!"

There was a silver plate upon the stock of the pistol, with the letter B upon it, but at the moment it did not strike Claude what name it might refer to.

"Come, sir," he said, as he threw up the pan, and then carefully closed it again, as he saw the pistol was very carefully primed. "Come, sir, these weapons are in good order, and will do. The word shall be 'fire,' and I will count three before I give it."

"That will do," said Dick.

"One—"

"Stop—stop"! cried Mr. B. "Stop."

"What for?"

"Only to consider a little. I—I—"

"Plague take you. Get up! It is not at all fair that you should be upon your knees, while my friend is upon his feet."

"Never mind," said Dick. "It's much the same."

"Two," said Claude.

Bang, went the pistol of Mr. B., and inflicted a slight flesh wound upon Dick's arm.

"An accident! An accident!" he called out. "I didn't mean it!"

CHAPTER CCCXLI.

DICK, WITHOUT INTENDING IT, GETS RID OF ONE OF MR. FIELD'S AND ALICIA'S ENEMIES.

THERE could be no doubt whatever but that the rascal who had already had one unfair shot at Dick, had, when he saw affairs were desperate, and that there was no escape from the encounter, determined upon trying the chance of another, and had so fired, when Claude said "Two," instead of waiting for the completion of the signal.

His calling out that it was an accident, was but a weak attempt to get rid of the consequences of the dastardly act.

"Three! Fire!" cried Claude, and before the smoke from Mr. B.'s pistol had cleared away, and before he could scramble to his feet, and fly from the spot, which he was attempting to do, Dick fired.

With a yell, the man sprang up into the air, and then fell like a log to the ground.

"That has done it," said Claude.

"I expect as much," said Dick; "but, after all, I am sorry for it."

"He is a great rascal."

"Yes, but not worth powder and shot, after all, when you come to think of it. But perhaps he is not killed."

The ladies in the coach now began to set up such a screaming, that Claude was obliged to run to the window and cry out to them—

"Silence! There is no harm done. It's only a joke, ladies, after all; but if you make that noise you will frighten the horses."

"Oh, but isn't anybody killed?"

"Certainly not. Be quiet, I beg of you."

Claude went back to were Dick was gazing at the body of his late foe, in an abstracted manner.

"Gone!" said Dick.

"Is he indeed dead?"

"Look!"

Dick indicated with his toe a spot on the forehead of the man, and there, sure enough, the bullet had gone right into the brain, making a clear round orifice into which you might put your little finger. His death must have been instantaneous.

"Come away, Dick," said Claude. "We have been too long here already. This is a deed that will soon be bruted all over the country, with such additions to it as will make it wear a very different aspect to the real one. Let us be off at once. Come—come."

"I should like to know who he is."

Claude ran back to the coach door, and said—

"Can any lady, or can you sir, tell me who the gentleman was who was here with you as a passenger?"

"Yes," said one lady, "it was Sir John Beachem."

"Sir John Beachem? You don't say so!"

"Yes, sir; and by your speaking of him as you do, I presume that he is dead."

Claude made no answer to this, but hastened back to Dick, and was upon the point of telling him who the dead man was, when Jack cried out loudly, but not in a tone of alarm—

"To the wood! To the wood!"

"What is it, Jack?"

"A strong party of horsemen are on the road. They seem to me to have seen the coach at a stand still, and to think it suspicious."

"The deuce they do."

"Quick! They come now."

"Where's my horse?" said Dick. "I tied her bridle to this tree. Good God! if I lose her I lose my right hand."

"There she goes into the wood," said Claude.

Jack galloped up to them.

"Are you both mad," he said, "that you do not fly from here? I tell you that our foes are all but upon us."

"They may be quite upon us," said Dick Turpin—"but how can I go without my Black Bess? Here is her broken bridle. The pistol-firing must have scared her, and yet I never knew her start at it before."

"No, Dick. But you were not with her now."

"Ah! that's it—that's it! We are lost—no, I mean I am. You two can go off; and I beg you to do so, and good luck go with you."

"Bad luck go with us if we desert you," said Claude. "Cannot we all take to the wood?"

"Yes; but these people will tell where we are; and you forget that I am on foot."

"Stop!" said Jack. "Listen to me. Dick, you can get up outside, and keep the passengers there quiet upon pain of death. Claude, you get inside, and do the same thing. Here, let us start your horse and mine into the wood. They won't go far either of them. I will borrow the coachman's coat and hat, and take his place on the box; and we will try and get through this rather ugly affair by a little finesse."

"By Jove, Jack, it's a capital plan!"

"Admirable!" said Dick; "and there is just enough of us to do it. But this dead body will tell tales, if we don't move it. Help me, Claude, will you?"

"Willingly. There he goes. Splash!"

They took the dead body of Sir John Beachem between them and cast it into a deep ditch by the road side. For a moment or two it seemed as if it would not sink in the rather thick fluid that the ditch was full of; but, gradually, as the clothing of the dead man became saturated with water, the fearful-looking evidence of violence settled down to the bottom of the muddy pool.

"That will do."

If the plan that had been suggested by Jack was to be carried out at all with any prospect of success, no time was to be lost in doing so; and, accordingly, the three highwaymen, with a certainty and promptitude that the life of danger and of hair-breadth escapes they had so long led could only have imparted to them, made the requisite arrangements.

The other two horses were conducted to the road side, and sent into the wood. Jack took possession of the coachman's hat, coat, wig, and whip, and said to him—

"You will sit behind me, and be quiet."

"Oh, dear, but—"

"Very good. Open your mouth."

"My mouth? What for?"

"The neatest way of blowing a man's brains out is to fire a pistol into his mouth upwards. It commonly blows off the top of his skull, and that is a settler."

"Oh—oh! it is! it is! I will do anything you like."

"So I thought you would. You are quite a sensible man. Now, get up and be quiet."

The coachman took a vacant seat behind Jack, who mounted the box, and, whip in hand, waited the result of the plan.

Dick Turpin clambered on the roof of the coach, and sat down among the passengers quite calmly, saying as he did so—

"Now, gentlemen, listen to me. The first one of you that makes the slightest alarm will get a bullet into his head. If I and my friends are caught we hang—and it makes not the least difference to us whether we take one or two of you into the other world with us or not."

The outside passengers looked rather ruefully at each other; and one, with his teeth chattering together with fear, that it sounded as if he were doing it on purpose, and trying to execute some extraordinary tune by that means in imitation of the castanets, said—

"Oh, dear me, I don't want to say nothing to nobody. Oh—oh! I wish I had my wife here."

"Silence!" said Turpin.

Claude Duval, when he saw that all was right with his two friends, sprang into the coach.

The ladies uttered screams; but he said "Silence, ladies!" in so peremptory a manner, that it had the effect he desired immediately; and then, as he sat down, he added in a low, distinct tone—

"Ladies, I beg that you will attend to me. There will come some wicked me? to the coach windows to ask some questions, possibly. I beg that you will leave me to answer them; for, if by word, or look, or action, you let them know that I am not a passenger by the coach, or contradict me in anything I shall say, there will be such a bother as you never saw or heard of; and there will be much bloodshed, the result of which I cannot foresee."

"Oh, we won't speak!"

"That is right. Fear nothing, for, mark me, I hold out no threats to you; so do not say afterwards that Claude Duval owed his safety to frightening the ladies."

"Then you are really," said one, "the—the—Duval?"

"I am, miss."

"Oh, dear, I never was so delight—I mean, so frightened—in all my life. Oh—oh!"

"Listen, if you please. They come! My life, ladies, I commit to your keeping. By a word, any of you may, I heartily believe, condemn me to death within the next five minutes, for I don't intend to be taken alive. Will any of you speak that word?"

"No—no!" they all said.

Claude smiled.

"I knew you would not. Beauty and gentleness ever go together."

"What a nice man!" said the oldest and most plain of the whole party. "Oh, sir, if you would only repent, and reform, and all that sort of thing, and—and then marry some one."

"Nobody would have me, madam."

"Well, perhaps no very young person; but—hem!—perhaps some one who was just past the follies of extreme youth, and—and in her prime of life, with a little property——"

"I don't think, madam," said a young lady, "that Claude Duval would like to marry any one old enough to be his grandmother."

"His grandmother, minx?"

"Why, yes; you are surely fifty-five?"

"Oh, gracious!—oh, providence!"

"Ladies—ladies!" said Claude, "I pray you to be mild, if you please—mild and quiet."

"But the idea!" said the old lady—"the idea of children, who ought to be kept in nurseries, and perpetually whipped, saying such things, is really—too—oh, gracious!—too dreadful!"

With a dash, and a great clatter of horses feet, the strong party of mounted men reached the carriage; and one of them cried out in a voice of authority—

"Halt!"

They all paused; and except the pawing of some of the horses upon the road, and the snorting of others, they were all still enough.

"Is anything amiss here?" said the man who had commanded the party to halt.

"Yes; there has been," said Claude Duval.

The man stooped, and looked into the coach.

"What is it, sir? We are on the look-out for three highwaymen, whom we have good reason to think are in this neighbourhood. I hope you have not been at all incommoded by them?"

"Only stopped and robbed, that's all."

"Robbed, sir?"

"Ask these ladies, if you doubt me."

"Oh, yes, it is true!" said all the ladies. "That is true enough."

"Confound it! how unfortunate," said the man, "that I and my party should be too late for the rascals."

"It is, indeed."

"How long ago was it?"

"Why, if you had come up, sir, only five minutes' ago you would have found them here, taking the affair quite easy, and having everything their own wey."

"Is it possible?"

"Quite so, I assure you; but you are just a little too late."

"By Jove! that is the most provoking thing that ever occurred to me. Did you know who they were, sir?"

"Why, of course, I should not; but in the coolest manner possible, one of them declared himself to be the celebrated Claude Duval."

"Oh, dear!—oh, dear!"

"What's the matter?"

"I was only groaning at the thought that I had missed him, that was all; and it is enough to make anybody groan."

"I don't know that. He is a determined fellow, and a good shot, they say, and I have heard that since his late escape from Newgate, he has made a determination that, let the consequences bet what they may, he will never be taken alive."

"Oh, stuff, sir. I have twenty men here."

"Twenty, say you?"

"Yes, twenty."

"Well, that is a good force, I admit; and I only wish you had got here a little sooner with it, and you might, perhaps, then have saved my watch and seals that I have been forced to part with to the fellow."

"Oh, dear—oh, dear! Which way did he go?"

"Towards town,"

"And here you are, all of you, outside and in, and suffer yourselves to be robbed by Claude Duval!"

"Ah, but he had two others with him."

"Two others! Why, they are Dick Turpin and Sixteen-string Jack! I should have nabbed them all!"

CHAPTER CCCXLII.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS EFFECTUALLY ESCAPE THE OFFICERS, AND STOP A CARRIAGE.

The distraction of the mounted officer at finding he had missed such a prize was so great, that he seemed ready to give himself up quite to despair, and Claude said then to him—

"I can't help thinking that you are losing valuable time. Hang it, man, they can't be above a mile off by this time. Why don't you and your twenty men go after them?"

"I will—I will."

"You will? It's all very well for you to say you will; but why don't you go at once?"

"Yes—yes; thank you, sir. Do you offer any reward for your watch?"

"Yes, twenty pounds."

"Very good, sir. Where shall we find you?"

"At the secretary of state's office in Whitehall."

Upon this the officer touched his hat, for he thought that in the gentleman in the coach he must surely have got hold of some official personage, with whom it would be just as well to be upon good terms as not.

"I will be off at once, sir," he said, "agreeably to your advice."

"You will do well," said Claude.

"Now, my men, come after me, like the devil himself!" shouted the officer

CLAUDE STOPPING THE PHANTOM FUNERAL.

"Claude Duval, Dick Turpin, and Sixteen-string Jack, are all three upon the road, only a little in advance of us, and if we rattle on we can come up to them. Forward—forward!"

"Good luck go with you," said Claude, "the further off you get. Hem! Well, ladies, I am happy to have freed you from your apprehensions concerning these fellows. You see, or rather you hear, I should say, that they are completely got rid off,"

"They are, indeed," said one of the ladies.

"And you do not regret it, madam?"

"Oh, no—no!"

"Nor any of you, I'm sure."

"Oh," said the old lady, as she managed adroitly to place a card, on which was her name and address, into Claude's hand, "I'm sure if you were ever to call upon me in London, I should be frightened out of my wits, that I should."

"Thank you, madam," said Claude, as with a smile and a bow, he got out of the coach. "I should be sorry to alarm you to that extent: so I shall not do myself that honour."

"The wretch!" said the old lady.

The others laughed, and Claude called out in a loud voice—

"It's all right, Dick and Jack. Come on, now. Ladies and gentlemen, we have the honour of bidding you all good day, and a very pleasant journey, indeed."

"Stop a bit," said Jack. "There's a phæton coming along the road, Claude, yonder."

"Very good. Let it come. Coachman?"

"Ye—e—es!" stammered the coachman.

"Drive on as fast as you can. Your traces have not been touched; but, remember, if you say one word on this side of Wycombe, whither I see you are bound, about me and my friends, you will be a dead man before the week is out."

"Oh, I won't—I wont!"

"Very good; now be off."

The coachman was to well pleased to get leave to drive off to delay about it; and as the cattle had had about twenty minutes rest when he laid the whip upon them, they set off at a first-rate pace, and the coach was soon out of view of Claude Duval and his friends.

There they stood in the middle of the road, and on foot, too.

"Well," said Turpin, "what have we made of this affair?"

Claude laughed.

"I have a pocket full of purses and watches," he said, "and an offer of marriage from an old lady."

"An old lady?"

"Oh, yes. Ha—ha! I have her card. But where is the phæton you spoke of, Jack? Has it gone?"

"No, there it is. Ha! it stops, and there seems to be some sort of parly going on with the driver of it. If we were but mounted, now, we wight make more, possibly, by stopping that phæton than we got from the passengers in the stage coach."

"There is not time to get our horses."

"Never mind. Here it comes again, and at a gallop, too."

It would seem as if the lady and gentleman in the phæton had had some apprehension that the three figures they saw upon the road might not be exactly desirable to meet, but that their coachman had advised them, as the men were on foot, to trust to the speed of their cattle; and so he lashed his horses into a gallop, and the carriage was whirled along at such a rate that the footman who was in the rumble behind looked scared, and held on to the back of the phæton with an immense kind of grin upon his face, as though he considered he was making great exertions to save his life.

"There goes his hat," said Jack.

"Yes—capital! What a hurry they are in, to be sure. There is one thing, though, that is pretty certain, and that is, that we cannot stop them as they go at the rate they are now going at."

"That's true. Out of the way."

Now, if the coachman of the phæton had been content with having lashed his horses into a gallop he might have done very well, but his fears or his unscrupulousness as to the use of the whip induced him to go on, and the cattle, no doubt began to think—for horses are quite sagacious enough to come to such conclusions—that it was rather unfair to bang them when they were doing their utmost, and so they got out of temper and began to kick.

"Curse you!" cried the coachman, as he still plied the whip. "Go on—go on, you devils, will you?"

The horses came to a stand still as regarded drawing the phæton, and one of them amused himself by standing on its hind legs, while the other kicked out terrifically.

"Murder!" shouted the lady in the carriage.

"Help!" screamed the gentleman.

The coachman swore and lashed at the horse that stood up, till he got the end of the thong of his whip entangled in the head gear of the animal, and then he was helpless.

"Leave the cattle alone, fool!" cried Jack. "Do you want to drive the horses mad?"

"Murder! Help!" cried the lady and gentleman.

"Be quiet," added Jack. "Don't make that squalling: horses don't like it. Woa—woa!"

Jack got hold of the reins of the kicking horse, and gently patted him on the neck, and coaxed him till he was as still as a lamb, and then the other one condescended to stand upon four feet again, and Turpin patted him a little, so that in a few moments, by dint of kindness and a little attention, the two horses were as peaceabble and willing as possible.

"They will do, now," said Jack. "I will hold them, Dick, while you and Claude speak to the parties in the carriage."

"Very good."

"Now, my fine fellow," said the coachman, waving his whip over the heads of his horses, and Jack's head, too. "Let them go. I don't want you standing there any longer."

"Oh, don't you?" said Jack.

"No; be off, will you?"

Jack quietly took a pistol from his pocket and pointed it at the coachman between the heads of the horses. As he did so, and glanced along the barrel of the weapon, it was quite a sight to see the look, first of surprise and then of alarm, deepening into actual contortions, that came over the fat, meaningless features of the driver of the phæton. The whip dropped from his hands, and his mouth and eyes opened to such a width, that he looked quite an object. All he said was—

"Oh, lor—oh, lor!"

"Samuel," said the lady in the carriage, "why don't you go on?"

"Oh, lor—oh, lor!"

"What is the matter with Samuel?"

"I don't know," said the gentleman.

Claude Duval, by a glance at the position of affairs, soon saw what it was that so powerfully affected Samuel, and then stepping to the side of the phæton, he said—

"Sir, you should discharge a coachman who treats your horses in such a fashion as yours has done."

"That is my business," said the gentleman, with considerable haughtiness.

"Very likely, sir. I have just told you that it is."

"Go away, my good man," said the lady. "There is sixpence for your services; you can go and get some what's-its-name—dear me, it's what the low people drink."

"Beer," suggested the gentleman.

"Oh, yes, beer. Go and get some beer at on ce.That will do—that will do my good man."

"Pray, madam, who are you?" said Claude.

"You wretch, how dare you ask? This gentleman is the Bishop of Ripon."

"Oh, indeed. Why, I have heard of your lordship; you have embezzled more of the money that was left to the poor and to schools, I do think, than any of your reverend brethren, so report says."

"Go along, fellow!"

"Oh, dear, no. Is this your lady?"

"Don't answer the wretch," cried the lady. "Don't answer him."

"But I will be answered," said Claude Duval, as he caught the bishop by the throat with his left hand, and placed the muzzle of a pistol at his head with the other. "Now, my lord bishop, who is this woman?"

"The Lord have mercy upon me!"

"The Lord may; but I will not, if you do not at once answer me the question that I have asked of you."

"She—she, is my housekeeper."

"Oh, indeed; and what was she before that?"

"She was, before that, Betty Aikin, the bar-maid at a tavern in the city."

"And so, Betty, the bar-maid, quite forgot that it was beer that low people were in the habit of drinking? Oh, Betty—Betty, you are the beggar on horseback, who rode over his old friends on foot."

"I'll scratch your eyes out!" cried the enraged Betty.

"And you are ugly, too," added Claude. "Ugly, and squint, and middle aged. Oh, my Lord Bishop, is this your taste? Oh, oh!"

Lady Betty thrust her hand into a pocket that was in the lining of the coach, and suddenly snatching out of it a pint black bottle, she made a blow at Claude Duval with it, and hit him on the cheek, so as to make the blood come.

"Take that," she said; "and now be off, or I will give you worse still."

"Betty—Betty," said Duval, with all the nonchalance in the world, "you are an insolent as well as an ugly female; but I will trouble you for your watch, trinkets, and money, and you, my lord bishop, for yours."

The bishop gave up his property without a word; but Betty fought and screamed, and tried to scratch to such a degree, that Claude was forced to call Dick Turpin, and then they lifted her out of the phæton between them, and accommodated her with a seat, which would have been very kind of them, if it had not been near the ditch by the road side.

"Now, Betty," said Claude, "be quiet, and give up your watch, and money, and rings, or in you go to the ditch."

"I won't—I won't! Oh, you wretches! I'll see you both hung with pleasure, that I will! I'll swear anything to hang you both! I'll——"

"Souse!" said Duval, and underneath went Lady Betty. "How do you feel now?" said Duval, when she emerged, covered with green slime, and half choked by the water. "How does your ladyship feel now?"

She gasped like a fish that is just pulled to dry land, and Turpin took the opportunity of disembursing her of a well-filled purse, and a gold watch and chain. There was a little set of tablets too, mounted with gold, that he took from her, and handed to Claude, who opening them, read upon the first page the following delicious memorandum:

"Tuesday.—Mem.—To place a yard of ribbon in Emma Gray's box, and then call in an officer, and say she stole it, and so get rid of her to prison. She is a deal too good looking, and the bishop looked at her yesterday."

"Did you write this?" said Claude.

"I did; and what then?"

"Dick, my boy, read it."

Dick did read it, and a flush of anger come across his face as he did so.

"What do you say to that, Dick?"

"Give her another souse," said Dick, and in a moment Lady Betty was under water again, and came up looking like some great drowned cow.

"Now," said Duval, "I am sorry to treat anything in the shape of woman in this way, Madam Betty; but there was no difficulty in seeing that you were a cold-blooded, selfish-minded, abandoned woman, and this horrid memorandum in your own tablets proves the truth of that opinion."

"Shall we give her another?" said Dick.

"No—no."

Lady Betty tried to scream, but her mouth was full of ditch water, and she could only make a gurgling noise. They lifted her up again, and flung her upon the bishop in the carriage, and then Claude Duval cried out—

"Let them go, Dick—let them go. That will do, Jack."

"Now, Mr. Coachman," said Jack, "if you please, be off."

The coachman was really too much frightened to drive; but Jack started the horses, so on they went, keeping the road very nicely of their own accord without any guiding at all.

"Our horses! our horses!" said Turpin. "I am getting anxious about my Black Bess, I can assure you."

"Come on, then, to the wood," said Jack.

"Be under no fear," said Claude; "we shall find them. The sweet herbage that is there in abundance will have proved a powerful means of keeping them to the spot."

"I hope so."

They all three now left the high-road as quickly as they could, and scrambling over the bank, they made their way among the trees, but to their disappointment, neither of the horses were visible.

CHAPTER CCCXLIII.

THE YOUNG LOVER IS TRUE TO HIS APPOINTMENT, AND CLAUDE COMMENCES THE CONVENT ADVENTURE.

The dread of the loss of their cattle was one which perhaps more powerfully affected the highwaymen than any other could by any possibility have done. Upon the possession of their horses might be said to depend their very lives.

Besides that consideration, constant association with the creatures begot a sort of affection for them, similar to that which the soldier in a long campaign feels for the gallant steed that has carried him often in safety through the din, and the smoke, and the danger of battle.

"By Heaven!" said Turpin, "I would not lose Bess for half the gold in England."

"Don't put yourself out of the way," said Jack; "you may depend she is not very far off."

"That remains to be seen. I shall soon find that out, although I dread to try the experiment."

"What experiment, Dick?" said Duval.

"I have a silver whistle here, the peculiar sound of which is so well known to Bess, that if she be within hearing distance of it, and can come to me at all, she will, and I can assure you that with her strength and agility it will not be a trifle that will keep her away."

"Sound your magic whistle, then, Turpin," said Duval. "Perhaps if the other horses are with her they may follow her to the spot."

"They may do so."

The spot upon which the three highwaymen were, was one in the very thickest portion of the wood, and so completely impervious to light that even at mid-day it would have been a difficult thing to see objects there with any degree of distinctness. The dead leaves of several seasons lay thickly upon the ground.

Dick Turpin took the small silver whistle that he had spoken of from his neck, and stooping low, so that the sound should travel as far as possible along the surface of the ground, rather than be dissipated amid the leaves of the old trees that covered the land around, he blew a long, low note.

Turpin continued to sound this note till his breath was exhausted, and then he put up the whistle, saying—

"It is of no use to use it twice. If she be within hearing, she will come at the first note."

"Ah," said Jack, "what is that?"

"What?"

"A sound like some one breaking some of the underwood."

"Ah, say you so?"

Dick Turpin flung himself at full length upon the ground, and placing his ear close to it, he listened for a moment or two in silence, and then he cried out in a voice of exultation—

"She comes—she comes!"

"Can you really hear her?" said Claude Duval.

"Oh, yes, quite easily. I know her tread, too. Ah, the whistle has done. The jade was only rambling about, after all, in search of the young grass. She is coming quickly."

"I only wish we had the like good fortune," said Jack. "Our horses don't understand the tune of—

"O, whistle, and I'll come to thee, my lad."

If they did, I'll warrant we should all be soon mounted and out of this confounded wood, for if we do stay here till night fairly falls upon us we shall find it no easy matter to get out of it, and our friend, Mr. Field, will begin to think that in trusting to our words he has been resting upon a broken reed, merely."

"Don't be uneasy, Jack," said Turpin. "I can hear the sound of other hoofs besides those of my bony black Bess."

"Can you really, though?"

"I can. Out of the way. Here she comes—here she comes.

"'Oh, my Bonny Black Bess!
By the glare of thine eye,
There is something that tells me
A traveller's nigh.
We'll cry to him 'Stand!' with a shout and a dash—
Pray, sir, please to hand out your watch and your cash.'

Ha! ha! here is the beauty. Here she is!"

Turpin's horse dashed through the thick underwood, and in another moment placed her head against his breast, and began to push him and caress him in something of the fashion of a pet cat.

"Oh you beauty!" said Dick, as he patted her on the neck. "Oh, you duck of a beauty! Did Dick say he would not lose you for half the gold in England? Bah! he ought to have said, he would not lose you for all the gold in England twice told!"

"It's wonderful," said Jack; "but the fact is, that Turpin's Bess must have told our two horses that they were wanted, for, lo! here they come."

"You don't say that?" said Claude Duval.

"Yes, Claude, and now the highwayman is himself again."

Claude Duval was well pleased to hold his horse by the bridle again; and from the ramble the creatures had had in the wood, they were as fresh and full of life as possible, so that they might at that time have been depended upon thoroughly in any enterprise that required steadiness, and endurance, and courage.

"Well," said Turpin, "here we are, not exactly like the babes in the wood, for we are in a little better case than they were; but here we are in the wood. What is to be the next caper?"

"Escape from our foes," said Jack. "They come!"

"Ah, say you so?"

"Jack is right," said Claude Duval. "I can hear them making this way through the underwood, although what sort of success they expect to have I don't know.

This is the way. As long as we keep some few hundred trees between us and then we shall do well enough."

"And as long as we keep our cattle out of danger, too," said Dick. "I am not going to part with Bess again in a hurry, I can assure you. Come on—come on."

There was no great difficulty in keeping on in advance of the noises of pursuit. It was pretty evident that a number of persons were employed in beating the wood, and in going through it in a body, no doubt, extending its whole width, for the purpose of dislodging whoever might be taking shelter in it.

All the highwaymen had to do, was to slowly retreat before their foes, and that they managed to do with great tact and decision.

Once or twice they heard the discharge of a gun; and once, by the peculiar rattling noise among the leaves of a tree close to them, they could guess that a bullet or two had found its way among them.

"I should like," said Turpin, "to give them a return of that compliment; but it is better not."

"Much better not, Dick," said Duval. "Whoever they may be who are hunting us through the wood, it does not follow that they are quite certain we are here."

"True—true."

"But if we fire, that is a question which would be set at rest in a minute."

"Yes," said Jack, "and along with it we should publish an advertisement, as it were, of our precise position."

"Oh, you need say no more," said Dick. "I won't fire, except they happen to hit Bess, and then I don't know exactly what possible inducement would be sufficient to prevent me from having satisfaction out of some of their thick skulls."

The sound of voices from the men who were coming through the wood with so much deliberation, came attimes upon the ears of the fugitives; but still their retreat continued without any untoward circumstance arising to mar its effect, and Claude Duval had a serious doubt if anything at all connected with them was the real cause of this search of a body of men in that direction.

He stated his doubts to his two friends, but they all agreed that, whether or not, it was better to go on, and they rather quickened their pace, as they got to the outskirts of the wood, where owing to the trees standing rather thinner, they were able to do so.

The sounds of pursuit through the wood gradually died away, and in a very short time the three highwaymen emerged upon a wide open expanse of open land, upon which the dews of evening were now falling fast, and enveloping it all in a misty mantle, that gave it the appearance of some vast ocean of vapour, for they could not see far enough to note the limits of the open space they were in, so it was left to their imagination, which under such circumstances always goes far beyond reality.

"We must get out o this," said Jack. "It will be on the increase rather than otherwise, and to lose your way in a white mist is just a degree or two worse than to lose your way in a wood, I take it."

"It is, indeed. Do you know the way, Jack?"

"Yes, so far as it is to the right."

"Let us take it, then, for I am thinking it is high time that we thought of keeping our appointment with our young friend, John Field, if we are to keep it at all."

"I would not break it for a thousand pounds," said Turpin.

"Indeed!"

"Oh, no. I expect some fine fun in that convent, I assure you."

"Well, there may be."

"I am certain that there will be. Something seems to tell me that that adventure will be one of the most delightful and varied of any that we have had for a long time; and, in fact, I would not let it go by on any account, if I can help it."

"Well, we are in good time," said Jack, "and, besides, if we should even be a little late, our young friend, Field, may well imagine that it is possible enough something in our profession may have happened to detain us."

They now, as Jack advised, made their way to the right, and by keeping as close as possible to the hedge, they managed, notwithstanding the white fog, to get along pretty well without straying far from the right direction.

After a time they came to a stile, which conducted directly into the Acton Road.

The stile was a little hindrance, but Jack managed to break it down at last, and then the horses walked over its ruins, and they were in the road. At a short distance in advance they saw a bulky-looking object.

"A coach," said Turpin, "and it is drawn up to the side of the road. I will wager anything now that that is the vehicle that belongs to our friend, John Field."

"Not a doubt of it," said Jack, "and if he be there alrendy, he is in a fidgety state for our appearance."

"No doubt he is," said Claude Duval. "I thought that, after all, he would hardly let anything short of death detain him."

"Is it our man?" said Turpin.

"Oh, yes. I knew him at once, dark as it is. Come on—come. It is all right."

"And I knew him too," said Jack. "He has rather a peculiar way with his head, and a quick mode of moving it from side to side; there is no mistaking him."

The united opinions of Claude and Jack convinced Dick Turpin that all was right, and they all three rode up to the figure that they saw by the old beech tree, and so near at hand to the coach that had halted on the road.

As they got closer, the young lover, for it was indeed no other than he, darted forward, crying out in a voice of joy—

"You are true to your appointment. How shall I thank you?"

"We are, Mr. John Field," said Claude, "and let us hope that we shall be able to rescue your Alicia from her foes, to the confusion of Mr. White the attorney, and his rascally employers, the Beachem family."

Claude did not think proper to tell him that the elder Beachem was no more.

"Yes, and from the machinations of the present Father Garvey, and of the Abbess of Berrymead Priory," said Jack.

"My dear friends," said Field, "my heart is too full of gratitude to you to thank you as you deserve."

CHAPTER CCCXLIV.

THE FIRST APPROACHES ARE MADE TOWARDS AN ATTACK ON THE CONVENT.

THERE did not now seem to be anything which could at all stand in the way of the prosecution of the plan for rescuing Alicia from the convent at Acton, and we may truly say, that never had Claude Duval engaged in any enterprise which had given him so much satisfaction, as the idea of the good he might be doing upon this occasion.

From time to time, in common with all the world, he had heard much of the principles and practices of the Roman priesthood, but it had never before occurred to him to come exactly in they way of seeing, or being in any way mixed up with any special case in which they were concerned.

For all, though, that young John Field had told him, he had every reason to believe that what continually took place in convents and nunneries far exceeded in atrocity even the tales that were told of them.

Hence was it, that curiosity, as well as an anxious desire to do all the good he could in the case, urged him on.

We need not say that Jack and Dick Turpin fully coincided in his views, and were resolved to aid him to the utmost.

It will be remembered that Claude had the letter of introduction to the Lady Abbess with which the lawyer had been provided, and, therefore, he considered that one half the difficulty of the affair was really over, since, armed with that letter, the gates of the priory would be at once opened to him.

Thus, then, was Claude and his friends, well armed, along with young Field, ready to do and dare anything in the cause of innocence—of the young girl, whom they fully resolved upon rescuing.

It will be remembered that Mr. Field had thought it prudent in this affair to get rid of Dennis, his sick servant, for more reasons than one, so that neither his ignorance, his blundering, nor his superstition, could stand in the way of a successful carrying out of the affair.

It was a comfort, too, to Claude Duval to think that there was nothing to conceal from the young lover but that he knew perfectly well to whom he was indebted for assistance, so that there was no necessity for Claude and his friends in what they should say to each other before him to keep a guard over their tongues, which, if he had not happened to be aware of their proper reasons and their profession, they would have had to do.

Even in the very dim light that there was from the sky, Claude could well perceive that the young lover was in a state of great agitation, so he said to him—

"Mr. Field, let me warn you of the necessity of keeping yourself quite calm and collected. Any precipitancy upon your part might ruin all our plans, and render the escape of Alicia from the convent all but impossible."

"Rely upon me," said the young man. "I will take orders from you; and whatever I may feel, you may depend upon my exercising a sufficient control over myself to keep quiet and not interfere with your judicious proceedings in my affairs."

"That is well. Believe that whatever we do is for the best."

"That I do and will with all my heart and soul. I hope, though, that you have a sufficiently good opinion of my discretion to trust me with all your plans?"

"It would be an insult to you not to do so, my good sir; so, now, I tell you that I think you and my two friends here must try to make yourselves as comfortable as you possibly can in this little wood, close to Hanger Hill, while I go to the convent and ascertain such particulars as shall enable us to act with some degree of certainty in the rescue of the young lady."

"Be it so. But how are we to know when our services are required by you?"

"You cannot possibly know except by my coming to you. Of course, much as I may despise the species of force that may be opposed to me in the convent, I do not hope or expect to be able to take Alicia by the hand, and bring her forth in spite of that opposition. I do not wish to drag her to liberty through a path of blood, although it is possible I may be able to do so; but I will make an attempt to do so by finesse what, if finesse should utterly fail, we will all do by force."

"I commend the view you take of the matter," said young Field, "and I feel that I could not possibly be in better hands than in yours, Claude Duval."

"Very good; what you say is a sufficient inducement to me to do my very best for you, so now let us go to the wood I spoke of, and there I must make some change in my outward appearance, and leave my horse to your care and that of my friends here."

To this young Field cheerfully assented, and there was one good effect that sprung from the quiet and calm tone in which Claude Duval spoke to him, and that was, that it calmed him down, and induced a much more agreeable state of his nervous system, which was a thing very much to be desired.

As they went the short distance across to the wood, which Duval had made mention of, Field said, in a voice that shook a little—

"You will take, let us hope, the very first opportunity you can possibly get to tell Alicia that I love her still as truly as ever, and that I am at hand to aid in her rescue."

"Be assured I will."

"And—and you will say to her that it is not from any shrinking from the dangers attending doing so that prevented me from being in your place, but that it was from the conviction that the object in view was too important to make it a matter of mere feeling with me, and that I let you go first with the conviction that you would do better than I could all that had to be done."

Claude Duval could very well comprehend the feeling under which the young lover spoke when he made such a remark as this, and he replied to him with kindness and discretion—

"My dear sir, Alicia shall understand from me that the grand object is to rescue her from the species of prison in which she is confined, and not to show off anybody's heroism in particular. I will tell her that by waiting for me in the wood you are doing more towards her rescue than you could possibly do if you were in the convent. Will that content you?"

"It will."

"Then you may depend upon my saying it, because it is, in fact, just the truth; for, you see, you love her and I do not, so I can act with that calmness and caution which only springs from a friendly feeling, while you, loving her as you do, would be led astray to do some desperste deed in her favour by that very love."

"Ah! will you tell her that, likewise?"

"I will."

"I am for ever, sir, beholden to you; I feel happier and lighter of heart now than I did before I had this explanation with you, for, to tell the truth, there was a fire burning in my heart that Alicia might think me backward and luke-warm in her cause by not myself coming."

"Your feelings are natural enough," said Duval, "and do you more honour than shame, Mr. Field; but be assured that all will be right, and if Alicia is the sort of young lady you say, she will at once comprehend the explanation that I give to her."

Claude Duval, from the slight interview he had already had with the young lover, thought well of him; but the delicacy of sentiment and very natural feeling that he had expressed, raised him considerably in the estimation of Duval.

They now reached the wood, where it was thought proper that the lover and confederates should wait, while he, Claude, should go to the convent, to make the first advance in the business. That wood has in a great measure been removed, and only portions of it, with cleared spaces between them, are now to be found at Hanger Hill, near Acton; but at the time of Claude Duval it really was a respectable enough, in point of size, miniature forest.

Just as they all got fairly under the trees, an odd falling sound caused them to look up, and then a spot or two of rain that forced its way through some of the interstices of the overhanging boughs let them know that there was a shower overhead.

"This is a good protection," said Claude, "against both wind and weather. If I mistake not, there is rather a sharp shower taking place, and yet, how little we feel of it."

"Little, indeed," said Turpin, "and it strikes me that it would require many hours of rain to soak right through some of the old chestnuts. How cool and fresh the air is."

"It is," said Jack. "I like the feel of this kind of air. At night it is epecially invigorating."

"That," said young Field, "is because at night all vegetable substances give forth oxygen gas, which is the vital principle of the air we breathe."

"You are quite scientific, young sir," said Jack.

"No, I have no such pretensions, but when any fact in natural philosophy strikes me as being important, I seldom forget it."

"I wish I could say as much," said Claude Duval, as he dismounted, and took the bridle from his horse's head. "The fact is, the only branch of natural philosophy that I have lent my attention to much, is comparative anatomy."

"Compartive anatomy?" said young Field. "That is a very interesting study, is it not?"

"Oh, yes; when I see a pretty girl with a charming figure, and quite an enchanting face, I compare her in my mind's eye to some other one I have seen whose beauty may be none the less, but who may present some different characteristics in regard to formation. That is what I call comparative anatomy, and a very delightful study it is."

"No doubt," said young Field, with a smile; "it is the most practical kind of comparative anatomy I ever heard of in all my life."

"It's coming now," said Jack.

"What is?"

"The thunder-storm. Hark!"

There was a rumbling of distant thunder now, and the air felt hot and sultry as if suddenly it had been deprived of much of that vital principle which young Field had spoken of.

"Ah, yes," said Claude Duval, "we shall catch it I expect even here, and I don't think this is the safest place in a thunder-storm; but, after all, though they say that trees attract the lightning, how seldom it is that you hear of one being struck. I am quite ready."

"But you will wait till the storm is over?" said young Field.

"Oh, no, my good friend, I am too used to storms of all sorts to care much about them, and my experiences of the delightfully uncertain climate of England are such that I have long since made up my mind not to allow any vagaries of the weather to stop me in the furtherance of any actual business."

Waving his hand to his two friends, Claude Duval stepped aside and opened the vallise he carried usually lashed to his saddle.

CHAPTER CCCXLV.

THE LADY ABBESS IS QUITE PLEASED WITH CLUDE DUVAL.

THE object of Claude Duval was to get from the vallise such articles of clothing as would make him look less like a knight of the road, and more like a lawyer.

Jack, he was well aware, knew what was in the vallise better than he did himself, and he motioned to Dick to step aside with him as well, in order that he might say a few words to them prior to his departure, which it was just as well Mr. Field should not be in any way alarmed by hearing.

"Jack," he said, "while I speak, look me out the most sober and lawyer-like looking apparel you can."

"Yes, Claude."

"Thank you. Now, Dick, and you, Jack, listen to me. I don't know but I may find more difficulty in this piece of business than at first sight may be apparent. The principal danger I am in is being suspected, and by some sort of treachery decoyed into one of the infernal lock-up places, which I am pretty sure they have in all convents, and which we may take it for granted are pretty numerous in such an old place as Berrymead Priory, and there left to amuse myself with my own thoughts. Now, I don't mean to say that there are any serious chances of such a catastrophe, but yet it is possible such a thing may happen."

"It may indeed," said Jack.

"Or you may be assassinated," said Turpin.

"True, my boy, I may be so, and it is to arrange with you what you are both to do in such a case that I now speak to you."

"But how can we tell?"

"Thus. If I do not make my appearance in the wood, and upon this spot, by midnight to-morrow night, you may assume that I cannot come to you."

"We will."

"Oh," said Jack, "I don't like the affair at all, and really begin to think, Claude, that it is attended by too much risk."

"No—no. Don't say that, Jack. It is only common wisdom to provide against possibilities. Mind you, I don't think this probable by any manner of means. Such things may happen, and that is all."

"But if you come not by the time you mention, what are we to do?"

"That it is not for me to dictate, as you must be guided entirely by circumstances as they turn out. All I have to say is, that you may assume something has gone amiss with me if I am not here at the time I have mentioned to you."

"Very good, Claude," said Turpin.

"But it ain't very good," said Jack rather petulantly, "and I don't like it."

"My dear Jack," said Duval, "be comforted. I don't think, in the first place, that anything is likely to occur to me in the convent for which I shall not be amply prepared, and if it should, I have full reliance in the power of yourself and Turpin, assisted by Mr. Field, of whose ready co-operation with you I feel assured.

"And so do I," said Dick.

"Stop a bit," said Jack. "I have plan. We will all go to the convent at once, and the instant the outer gate is opened we will seize the first person we see, and then go on triumphantly, and take the place by force of arms."

"No—no," said Duval, "that won't do. You are delaying me, Jack, by not looking out the things I want, and for which I relied upon your judgment."

Upon this, Jack said no more, but got out a suit of clothes, which most effectually disguised Claude Duval, so that when he was attired in them, and had put on a cravat of fine cambric, and composed his features to a serious look, he certainly did not in any degree resemble a highwayman, although he looked more like a gentleman than a lawyer.

"Will that do?" he said.

"Capitally," replied Dick.

"It is a good disguise," said Jack, "but you don't look like a lawyer, Duval, and never could be made to do so."

"Never mind, this will do. I have the letter of introduction to the abbess, and my pistols all ready, so now I am off. Mr. Field, good-evening. I hope to bring you a good report of your affairs before long."

"Heaven protect, and aid you," said Field, with considerable feeling, as he now stepped forward, and shook hands with Claude Duval. Jack and Dick did the same, and in another moment Claude was off.

During the process of dressing himself for the occasion the thunder had repeatedly made itself heard in peals of reverberating echoes overhead, and once a vivid flash of forked lightning had seemed actually to play among the trees.

The rain, which had heralded in the storm, had ceased when the lightning became apparent, so that Claude in making his way to Berrymead Priory, had not to encounter the disagreebles of getting wet through, which he had only a short time before thoroughly expected.

With his natural knowledge of the country, Claude took but a short time to reach the corner of the lane at which the entrance to the old convent was.

To those conversant with the spot, it will be well known that the convent wall extends a considerable distance down a lane, as well as along the side of the high road, and that it is a wall of great strength, further secured by massive brick buttresses sloping to the road, and that it has all the appearance about it of great age.

It was at the corner, then, of this lane that Claude Duval paused, upon that eventful evening, and took a brief glance upwards at the scudding clouds and the strange colour of the sky, before he applied for admission at the convent gate.

Two or three big drops of rain fell upon his face, and by the sound of the next peal of thunder, he felt convinced that the storm was passing over Acton rapidly, and would soon be gone from that immediate neighbourhood. The sky, however, in the north-west looked very strange and threatening.

"Well, let it thunder, and blow, and rain," said Duval, "it don't matter to me. I shall soon be housed, and I daresay I shall be glad enough to get out again, for there is something even now about the very look of this place that is enough to give one a cold chill to cast one's eyes upon it."

Duval looked carefully for some means of making his presence known at the priory gate, and at last he saw the iron handle of a bell. He laid hold of it and gave it a smart pull, when the dull, monotonous tone of a bell, with certainly a crack in it, immediately responded, and he waited with some degree of anxiety for the result of this first and important step in the business.

The French have a proverb that the first step in most affairs is the only difficult one, and in many affairs it is undoubtedly true, although not in all. Still in the enterprise he was one, Claude considered that if he succeeded in deceiving the Lady Abbess into the idea that he was the agent of the Beachem family, that would be the first step that would lead to success.

With such a feeling, he in a low voice repeated to himself the French proverb, as the tingling of the convent bell sounded in his ears.

After waiting above five minutes, and finding that no attention was paid to his summons, he rang again. Five minutes more elapsed, and still no one came, so that Claude began to suspect that there must be some other entrance at which he ought to apply, and that this one, although apparently the principal one, was really disused.

"Confound the place," he said, "I don't see any other gate at all. I will ring once more, and then give up this part of the wall, and take a survey of the rest of it."

The ring that he now gave at the bell was rather a sharp one, for he was impatient. It had an effect, for a voice suddenly said—

"Who rings?"

Claude started, for the voice was close to his ear. The fact was, that a little square wicket was opened in the gate, and that as he stood by it, it happened to be close to him,

"Who rings?" said the voice again.

Duval understood in a moment that he stood by a little opening in the door, and by putting out his hand he felt that a grating of iron bars was over it.

"I wish to see the Lady Abbess," he said.

"What Lady Abbess?" said the voice.

"The Lady Abbess of this convent. Have you more than one?"

"That is our business. You cannot see her. Who are you?"

"I am a visitor, who having rung three times, surely expects a civil answer."

"If you had not rung three times, you would not have had any answer at all," said the voice. "So many lunatics amuse themselves as they pass, by ringing at the convent bell, that we never take any notice of one or of two rings, but at the third we come to the gate."

"Oh, that is it; but who are you?"

"The portress."

"Well, I have a letter for the Lady Abbess, by which she will know that I was expected, and that I have real business with her."

"Give it to me."

"No, it is for herself only, I must give it into her own hands. I cannot part with it otherwise."

"Man," said the portress, in a cracked and passionate voice, "if you were to remain where you are till the day of universal judgment, you would not be admitted."

"But ——"

"Peace! Do not disturb the repose of this holy place. Go your way."

"No; I come from London, and I must perform my mission. If there be no other way of proceeding but giving you the letter, I must do so; but you surely will not keep me outside here till the abbess reads it?"

"Yes."

Claude Duval was now rather puzzled to know what to do, and he was silent for a few moments. If he refused to give the letter, he considered that, after all, he should do no good, while, if he gave it, although he did not like to part with it in such a way, it was possible enough it might answer all the purpose for which he brought it.

Suddenly, while he was thus cogitating, the little wicket in the door was shut with a sharp noise.

"Stop! stop!" cried Claude, as he struck it with his fist; "stop! I agree to your terms. Give me your assurance that the Lady Abbess shall have the letter forthwith, and I will hand it to you."

The wicket was opened again.

"Give it to me!" said the voice sharply.

Duval handed the letter sideways through the iron bars; and in another moment it was snatched from him, and the wicket in the door closed and bolted, for he heard the bolt shot into its socket.

"A pleasant reception, this," said Claude. "We shall see how it all ends."

CHAPTER CCCXLVI.

DUVAL DISCOVERS SOME OF THE SECRETS OF THE OLD PRIORY.

As the thunder storm had passed away, the rain clouds seemed to think that it was only proper for them to interfere, and to soak the earth and everything upon it as quickly as possible.

While Duval had been talking to the portress, he had got considerably rained upon; but now as he did not know how long it might be before he got an answer to his epistle, he stepped some few paces on one side, and got under a perfect canopy of overhanging ivy, which came over the top of the convent wall, and which sheltered him from the descending rain, except so far as a few splashes were concerned.

After about a quarter of an hour, as nearly as Claude Duval could guess, for it was too dark by a great deal for him to see the hands of the gold watch he had in his pocket, and which he tried to consult, he heard a voice say—

"Where are you?"

"Here—here!" said Claude, stepping up to the wicket gate—"here I am, and getting rapidly wet through."

"That is of no consequence," said the voice.

"To you certainly not; but to me I humbly suggest that it is not at all pleasant."

"Silence! Don't be chattering there. Is your name Block?"

"Block?"

"Yes, is it Block? The letter is signed 'William Block.'"

"Oh," thought Claude, "this is to catch me in some prevarication, and to find out if know the contents of the letter or not."

"You will excuse me, Madam Portress," he said; "but if the Lady Abbess has told you that the letter is signed Block, she has misled you."

"Who wrote it, then?"

"Mr. Beachem."

"Oh, indeed? But it makes mention of you as Mr. Block, and so gives you an introduction to the Lady Abbess."

"I beg your pardon," said Duval. "My name is White."

"Oh, White, is it? Dear me! what a memory I have got. You are a doctor, I believe?"

"No, a lawyer."

"Well, I said a lawyer."

"Oh, did you?"

"Of course I did; and you come to see a young lady named Fanny, so the letter seems to say?"

"Wrong again," said Claude, who was now fully alive to the Jesuitical cross-examination he was being subjected to, and could easily foil it, let it last as long as it might. "Wrong again, madam. The young lady concerning whom and on behalf of whose friends I am here, is not named Fanny."

"Indeed! What is her name, then?"

"Alicia."

"Oh, you don't say so? Well, you may come in; but, really, I don't think it is right to let you."

"You can leave it alone, then," said Claude, pretending to have lost all patience. "I am quite willing to go back to my highly respectable client, Mr. Beachem, and tell him the sort of reception that I met with here, notwithstanding his letter of introduction, which he said would smooth all difficulties. I am a professional man, and a respectable man, and I don't like to be treated in this way."

"Peace! peace!" said the portress, as she took Claude by the arm, and pulled him through the narrow opening at the gate. "Peace, I say! You do not know how cautious we are forced to be."

"About what?"

"Why, about whom we admit within these walls. If we were not to be ever on the defensive we should soon be very differently situated to what we are; but now that there is no doubt of who and what you are, all will be quite well, and you will find yourself capitally treated at Berrymead Priory. You ought not to feel offended at the precautions we are compelled to use to keep out improper persons."

"Well, there is something in that."

"There is everything in it. Why, this very Alicia has a lover whom we have been specially told to guard against. How did I know but that you might be some artful emissary from him?"

"Oh, but the letter!"

"Ah, that's all very well; but still the most extraordinary things do occur, and you might have obtained possession of it in some surreptitious manner."

"That's true," said Claude.

"Exactly so; and, therefore, it was quite necessary that I should try you to know if you really were aware of its contents. Come, all is right, now—I will get a light—come this way."

The conciliatory tone of voice in which the woman spoke, Claude thought was more disagreeable than the sharp, suspicious one in which she had addressed him through the grated wicket; but he played his part well by saying—

"Don't notice it, I beg of you. Of course, knowing that I was in the right, I did at the moment feel a little hurt by the suspicions that were expressed of me, but, upon reflection, I see the full necessity of caution."

"Of course, you do."

"Yes, and when, likewise, I come to consider that so pleasing a person as yourself conducted the cross-examination, I am the more inclined to think nothing of it."

"Oh, sir!"

"Hem!" thought Claude. "This horrid wretch is open to flattery. That is a useful piece of information."

THE COINERS READING MR. WHITE'S PAPERS TO YOUNG FIELD.

"I am quite sure you don't mean what you say," added the portress, as she gave Claude's arm a squeeze that almost made him cry out.

"Oh, yes, I do," he said.

"No, no—you fancy that I am handsome."

"It's no fancy—I am certain you are."

"And what, pray, can make you so certain, Mr. Flatterer?"

"The beauty of your voice makes me think that you must have a fair face. If that ain't a crammer," thought Claude, "there never was one told in this world."

"Ah, that's like all you men!" sighed the portress. "You do nothing but flatter us poor girls, till you ruin us."

"Oh, no—no!"

"But I say yes. However, we will talk about all that another time. I must now take you to the Lady Abbess, who anxiously expects you; and if she thought that I had said one-half that I have to you, I should find my way to one of the cells."

"The cells, do you say? Then, there are——"

"Hush! hush! Don't ask any question. It's much better for you to know nothing here than too much, I assure you. Whatever business you have to transact let it be done quickly, and then get away."

"I will follow your advice."

"But if—if you are inclined to come and have a little chat with me at another opportunity, you know, that if you tap with your knuckles, or with anything that will make sufficient sound for me to hear, at the wicket gate, always taking care that no one sees you, I will open it."

"Oh, what charming condescension," said Claude. "Dear me, what's that?"

Claude had nearly fallen over a step that was in his way.

"I ought to have warned you of the step," said the portress. "You had better stay where you are, now, till I get a light."

"Thank you."

Duval felt that he was standing upon some boarded place now, and that he was out of the open air. All was profound darkness for a few moments, and then there came a faint light, and the portress who had left him came back, carrying in her hand a small lamp.

By the light of that lamp Claude Duval saw that she was a wrinkled hag-like looking woman of about fifty years of age, and that she squinted fearfully as she leered upon him.

It was as much as he could do to conceal the disgust with which he looked at her, for in addition to her other charms, the small-pox had made fearful ravages in her face.

It did not appear, though, that this woman thought herself otherwise than very passable in her looks, if not absolutely charming, for when she saw Claude Duval looking at her she put on quite a simper, and cried out, with all the air of a young girl inclined to flattery—

"Really, now, how you do look at one—don't—oh, go away!"

"Charming creature," said Claude.

"Oh, you gay man!"

"No, I assure you I am not. But can it be possible that you give me leave at some other opportunity to call and see you?"

"It will be exceedingly imprudent of you to do so: but if you will, why, really I don't see how I can help it."

"Then, at some other opportunity I will avail myself of the generous permission."

"Mind you do. Heigho! you are not at all bad-looking."

"Thank you."

"Now don't come near me. I don't want any impertinence, though there is nobody here. Don't be kissing me."

"I won't," said Claude; "your commands are law to me. I shall take good care to keep my distance, you may be assured; and I have no doubt but that the Lady Abbess is getting furious at not seeing me."

"Oh, gracious, yes! Come this way. I had forgotten her at the moment; I am afraid you are quite a rake. But let me warn you of the Lady Abbess; for, between you and me, she is—oh, dear, that I should say it!—rather fond of the men."

"You don't say so?"

"It is a melancholy truth. Father Garvey is just at present her confessor—hem!"

"Oh, he is. I heard something of him from Mr. Beachem. A very holy sort of man is he not?"

"Oh, uncommon! But the Lady Abbess is rather jealous, and so he has a great deal of trouble, poor man!"

"Trouble? How so?"

"Oh, don't ask me, I beg of you. But she will persecute the nuns so, and more particularly those that Father Garvey likes the best."

"Oh, indeed; is Alicia among that number?"

"Yes; but of all the obstinate wretches that ever stepped, she is about the worst; but she will never see the sun shine outside the walls of this house again."

"Oh."

"Oh, dear no, she knows too much, so that's quite sufficient; but, mind you, when you see the Lady Abbess, don't seem to know anything, for you cannot think how desperately cunning she is, and when you least expect it, she is studying your looks, and putting artful questions to you."

"I will be upon my guard."

"Do so. Oh, you are a very nice man, but really are just a little—only a little—too—too——"

"Too what?"

"Too retiring and timid, if I may say so much."

"Dear me," said Claude, "that is not my general character at all—I quite wonder at your saying so. But where are we now?"

CHAPTER CCCXLVII.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND FATHER GARVEY DO NOT AGREE VERY WELL TOGETHER.

While the portress had been thus, in a low tone of voice, telling to Claude Duval a great deal more than she ought to have told him, and which she would not have dreamt of mentioning but that she was thrown off her guard by the fond belief that at last she had found some one who was enamoured of her, they had proceeded from the lodge entrance to the convent, along a peculiarly gloomy path of the garden, which was so completely overgrown by tall trees, that even in the daytime it must have been quite impervious to light.

The ground was well gravelled though, so that it was clean enough to walk upon, and perfectly dry.

After traversing this path for some time, they had come to what appeared like a low stone wall, and that was what had occasioned the inquiry that had come from Claude's lips of—"Where are we now?"

"Hush!" said the portress, in a whisper. "I come no further than here. You will find another of the sisters, who will now conduct you to the abbess. Be cautious and discreet, and rely upon my affection for you."

As she said this, the portress, unable any longer to conceal her gratification at making the acquaintance of Claude Duval, flung her arms round his neck, and embraced him, and spilt a quantity of oil from the lamp over him.

Most certainly, under any other circumstances than those then existing, in which it was a necessary thing, and might naturally tend to the success of the affair that had brought him to the convent, to be upon good terms with the portress, Claude Duval would have got rid of her by some very summary process; but as it was he put up with the embrace as well as he could, disagreeable as it was to him.

"I think I here some one," he said.

"Oh, gracious! No!"

The portress released him in a moment upon this, and disappeared down the dark walk with such rapidity that Duval was quite delighted to get rid of her.

Before he could take a thought of what he was to do next, a voice said in a low tone—

"Are you there?"

"Yes," said Duval.

"The stranger?"

"Yes—all right," said Duval, "I am Mr. White."

"That will do. Follow me."

"But I don't see you at all, or I would follow you."

"The door is open. Surely, it is not so dark but that you can see an open door-way from a dark one. Look well about you."

Thus advised, Claude Duval did look well about him, and he saw that in the stone wall that appeared to block up the further progress of the dark pathway, a low arched door was opened. Stepping at once forward, he passed through the doorway, saying as he did so—

"I see the door open now, and I will follow you, as I perceive that you are there, whoever you are."

"I am Sister Jude," said the voice.

Claude did not feel that his stock of information was very much increased by being told that it was Sister Jude who spoke to him, for he could see no one. After however, going a few steps along a narrow passage, a faint light dawned upon his senses, and still further on the light was sufficient to enable him to see a figure in a long gray dress with a black veil on the back part of her head, and, as he thought, on her face likewise, but in that he was mistaken.

The light came from a lamp that was upon a bracket before a little image of the Virgin Mary, that was fastened in some way to the wall.

Upon arriving opposite to the image, Sister Jude made a low reverence, and mumbled some prayer in a strange chanting tone of voice. Then she turned and looked at Claude, presenting to his view a face that, no doubt, had at one time been very comely, but which was now so very pale, and had such an expression of hopeless woe, that it was painful to look upon it, and said—

"You are not one of us?"

"I am not a Roman Catholic."

"It is strange that you are here, then. But that is no business of mine. I am the abbess's personal sister."

"What is the meaning of that?"

"Simply that I wait upon her."

"I understand you. I am, then, to be taken to the abbess by you?"

"Yes, such are her orders; and let me advise you—yet, no. It is better to say nothing."

"I beg of you that any advice you are kind enough to think of giving to me you will not withhold."

Sister Jude had altered her mind, and she made no reply to this appeal from Claude Duval, but walked off so quickly, that he had to run in order to keep up with her, seeing that she had got some twenty paces or so in advance of him.

"It is very cruel of you," he said, "not to finish what you were about to say."

The nun turned abruptly upon him.

"It is much more cruel of you," she said, in a low tone, that almost approached to a whisper, "to get me into danger of my life by speaking in such a strain to me, within the hearing of one who may resent it upon me."

"I did not know that."

The nun placed her finger upon her pale lips as a signal to him to say no more, and Duval was silent accordingly, for nothing could possibly be further from his thoughts or wishes than to bring distress or danger upon any of the miserable victims of the monastic institution. Such a vile and unnatural state of things he felt brought with it its own sufficient punishment to all who had anything to do with it. Claude Duval knew well that where there was not vice in a nunnery or a monastery that there must be wretchedness.

It is likely enough that there may be in such institutions some poor belated insane creatures, who may fancy that they are living quite in a state of beatitude; but then we always find that the greater number of lunatics are those who are mad upon religious subjects.

Of such the real and true religious recluses are found. All others go into convents, either from the crimes which, to speak vulgarly, have made the world too hot to hold them, or because they have found out that there they may have an opportunity of leading a life of the most unbridled licentiousness.

Added to this, there are some positive prisoners, who have found out too late what the system is, but who are not permitted to escape to blazon forth to the world the iniquities they would fain shun.

No doubt this poor Sister Jude was one of this latter class, and the Lady Alicia would have been converted into one, but for the interference of Claude Duval and his associates.

But we must not anticipate. Our object in detailing this portion of the adventures of Claude Duval is to give the reader an insight into the conventual system, and so we go into rather more details than we have usually done.

Sister Jude now tapped gently against the panelled wall, and after a few moments the faint sound of a little handbell was heard.

"Come," she said. "This way."

She went on for about twelve steps, and then opened a door, immediately upon the other side of which was a thick green baize, that hung in many folds from the ceiling to the floor.

"Wait till you are told to enter," said the nun, and then, without pausing for any reply from Duval, she left him, and returned in the same direction from which they had come.

Duval listened, but could not hear the slightest sound on the other side of the entrance for the space of about three minutes, and then a voice, which came only in muffled tones to him, cried—

"Enter!"

The only way of entering was evidently to pull aside the green baize curtain, so Duval did so, although its numerous folds gave him some little trouble, and caused some time in setting aside. The moment, however, that he fairly removed the obstruction, the light that his eyes encountered rather dazzled him for a time, and he was compelled, as he stepped into a large and handsome room, to shield his eyes with his hands.

"Come in, Mr. White," said a voice. "I have been expecting you for some time. The last letter that I had from Mr. Beachem, led me to suppose that you would be here last night."

"Madam," said Claude, "I was robbed on the highway and delayed."

Duval's eyes had got now a little familiar with the strong light in the room, and he was able to look about it, as well as at the Lady Abbess of the convent.

The Lady Abbess was rather a tall, robust looking woman, of about forty years of age, with a high colour, that looked exceedingly like paint—she had very glittering teeth, which were rather prominent, and her hair, which was seen partially, was nearly black.

Take her for all in all, she was what people of vulgar taste generally call a fine woman.

She was rather richly attired in black silk velvet, and had a very rich lace veil over her forehead, but principally hanging down her back, nearly reaching to the floor.

The room which was occupied by the Lady Abbess was one well worthy of some little description; but it must not be supposed that Claude Duval had an opportunity of so minutely examining it upon his first introduction to the abbess. We merely say what we do of it for the satisfaction of the reader.

The room, then, was of large size, being very nearly square, and running about thirty feet in each direction. Upon two sides of it, it had windows, these testifying that it was at the corner of the house.

The ceiling was beautifully painted in some allegorical subject having reference to the state of beatitude of the saints of the Catholic church, after they had given up the troubles and the turmoils of this life.

Upon the walls of this room hung some superb paintings, and there were likewise some richly carved old cabinets in oak and other woods. The floor was nearly entirely covered by a Turkey carpet, which looked as dingy as Turkey carpets usually do.

The draperies at the windows, of which there were six, were all drawn closely over them, and the light that had so dazzled Claude Duval at first, came from a huge lamp that was upon the table, and which just being about the level of any one's eyes, was anything but agreeable. That lamp was the only thing in the room which could be said to be in bad taste.

CHAPTER CCCXLVIII.

FATHER GARVEY APPEARS UPON THE SCENE AND THINKS CLAUDE DUVAL AN INTERLOPER.

Such, then, was the apartment in which the abbess at Berrymead received Claude Duval, supposing him to be the unscrupulous agent of the Beachem family, and one of the persecutors of Alicia.

Observing that Duval hesitated, and not knowing that it was from the effect of the sudden light, the abbess, who was seated upon one of the old, high-backed Elizabethan chairs, which are to be found in old houses, called out to him in rather a sarcastic tone of voice—

"I am glad to see you, Mr. White. Why—why, how is this?"

"How is what, madam," said Claude, bowing.

"Mr. Beachem said that you were a—a——"

"Lawyer, madam, I presume?"

The abbess laughed, and added—

"No. He said that you were anything but what you are, Mr. White. Why he surely must be blind to represent you as he did to me, as anything but a gentlemanly-looking man. Mind, he did not for a moment disparage your character, but he did not tell me that you were good-looking, as indeed you are."

"Really, madam," said Claude, "you quite flatter me by your kindness."

"Not at all—oh, not at all," said the Lady Abbess. "I hope that you will not think so for a moment; indeed it would quite distress me were you to entertain such an opinion."

"Then you are exceedingly liberal," said Claude Duval, "to entertain so kind an opinion of one who is a stranger to you."

"Oh, not at all. At the first glance it is impossible to mistake you for other than what you are."

"Indeed, madam?"

"Oh, yes; you are a man of the world, and a gentleman. I am only rather surprised that Mr. Beachem should so far have mistaken your character, as he appears to me to have done."

"Has he really done so, madam? Pray what has he taken upon himself to say of me? I hope you will tell me, and in asking you to do so, I beg to assure you that the information shall go no further."

"I may rely upon your honour?"

"Oh, perfectly; I hoped that you would see I was sufficiently a man of the world never to betray the confidence of a lovely and confiding woman."

The abbess nodded and laughed.

"I don't think," she said, "that I am often mistaken in my estimate of any one, and I feel quite sure that such is not the case in the present instance. I have a good opinion of you."

"That, madam, is all I require to make me quite happy."

The Lady Abbess looked at Claude and shook her head, and smiled again as she said—

"I don't know yet whether I ought to trust you; but I suppose, after all, that I must do so."

"You may depend upon one thing," said Claude Duval, as he returned the smile, "and that is, that if any good is to be got out of anybody it is by trusting them."

"You are a philosopher, indeed."

"Only in a small way, madam. But I do think that a little association with you would make anybody anything you choose."

All this time the Lady Abbess kept looking at Claude Duval in rather a peculiar manner, and he began to entertain a serious idea that she was mistrustful of him, and that, after all, she was not so easily deceived as he thought she would be. The thought gave Duval some little disquietude as regarded the success of the expedition he had come upon, but still, as he could not be quite sure about it, he resolved to carry on the same appearance he had started with as long as possible.

Claude Duval had ample reason to know in a short time that he was very much mistaken indeed with regard to the light in which the Lady Abbess regarded him; but we must not anticipate events which we are proceeding to record in the due order of their occurrence.

Duval would have liked to ask at once about the Lady Alicia, but he dreaded to appear to be too eager upon that part of the subject lest he should give rise to suspicion of his motives, if there were really none already, and if there were suspicions already entertained of him he dreaded to confirm or strengthen them.

Under these circumstances, then, Claude Duval was exceedingly discreet.

"And so," said the abbess, as if only giving utterance to the suggestions of a turn of thoughts that she had been engaged in, "and so you are a lawyer, are you?"

"I am, madam."

"Well, this is very agreeable."

Claude looked at her as though he would have said—"Pray, madam, have the goodness to explain yourself."

"You do not understand me," she said, "but what I meant was, that, situated as I am in this place, it is a very desirable and agreeable thing to know that there is a professional man like yourself who is not at all scrupulous about what sort of suit he engages in, and who likewise is so much a man of the world and, I may say, a gentleman, that one may be always glad to see you here."

Claude bowed, as he said—

"Madam, when first I engaged in this business at the instigation of Mr. Beachem I flattered myself that it would be a kind of introduction to you and to the convent, which would lead to pleasing results."

"You are right—you are right. I am delighted to see you. Come, sir, you don't like our convent wine."

"It is excellent—madam, I drink to the conservation of your beauty, and to our better acquaintance."

The wine, to tell the truth, was about the finest that he, Duval, had ever tasted, and he had not the remotest objection to indulging himself with a glass or two of it. He filled the glass for the abbess, but before she could raise it to her lips there came a mysterious knock at the chamber-door.

"Ah, who knocks?" she cried.

The door was opened, and an old nun just peeped into the room, and whispered something to the abbess.

"Well, let him come," laughed the abbess, "let him come."

The nun retired with a curtsey.

"May I ask who it is that you have given leave to come here?" said Claude.

"Yes, it is Father Garvey."

"A priest?"

"Yes, and our convent confessor. I do not know that your appearance here will give him any satisfaction, but that does not at all matter. He must take his chance of these things."

Claude Duval did not care to inquire more particularly into the meaning of what the abbess said. He had a shrewd guess upon the subject, and that was quite sufficient for him; moreover, the arrival of the confessor put a stop to any further confidential discourse with the abbess.

Father Garvey was a man about forty years of age, rather short of stature, but of a strong, well knit frame, as far as could be judged beneath his monastic dress, which hid the greater part of the figure.

The complexion of the holy father was dark, almost to blackness, and his black eyebrows met across his brow in a manner that gave him a strangely sinister look.

He made two steps into the room in what might be considered an easy and an unembarrassed manner; but then his eyes fell upon Claude Duval, and he gave a slight start; and, crossing his arms upon his breast, he bowed to the Lady Abbess.

"This is a friend," said the abbess.

"A friend?" echoed the priest.

"Oh, yes, I assure you, Father Garvey, that this is a particular friend of mine."

"Indeed."

"Will you allow me to introduce you to him?"

"Madam, I think that it will be as well if at the present time I decline that honour and pleasure. My mind is so full of holy meditations that I fear to disturb the current of thought by any intercourse with strangers. I was coming here to ask your opinion about a passage in the writings of the holy St. Chrysostom, which appears to me rather difficult to comprehend."

"Stuff!" said the abbess.

"Madam?"

"Stuff, I say! This is Mr. White, the attorney of Mr. Beachem. Are you now satisfied, Father Garvey?"

"You don't say so!" said the confessor, stepping forward with quite an altered manner. "My dear sir, how are you?"

"Pretty well, I thank you," said Claude. "But do not let me disturb your pious meditations about St. Chrysostom."

"D——n St. Chrysostom!" said the confessor.

Claude laughed; and the Lady Abbess handed Father Garvey a glass of wine, which he tossed off with as jolly an air as possible. Claude Duval was highly amused at this sudden change in the manner of the pious confessor, and resolved to bring him out as much as possible.

"Various circumstances," said Duval, "have delayed me, or I should have been here much earlier; but I hope that there will not be many difficulties in the way of proceeding with Alicia. What sort of mind is she in?"

"It is hard to say," said the abbess. "What do you think, Father Garvey?"

"Confound her!" said the confessor; "I don't know what to say about her. How very beautiful she is."

"Indeed, Garvey!" said the abbess; "you begin to admire her, do you? Well, I thought that some day you would leave off complimenting me, and take to some one who comes rather nearer to your taste."

"That is very strange," said the confessor, "for do you know that I always had the idea that some day you would see some one whom you would think much more of than you ever did of Father Garvey."

As the confessor spoke he looked at Claude Duval.

The abbess at the moment looked rather flushed, and seemed as if she meditated a passionate reply.

If her ladyship did at the instant feel hurt by the cool manner in which the confessor alluded to the fact which he had, with the tact of his calling, read in her eyes, that she was enamoured of Mr. White, the lawyer, she quietly abandoned the idea, and bursting into a loud laugh, she cried out—

JACK STOPS MR. AND MRS. DAY.

"Well, done, Garvey—well done. I release you from all allegiance to me. Go with your sighs where you please."

"And I congratulate you, madam, upon finding one who is so much more worthy of your regard than myself."

There was just a slight tone of acidity about the way in which Father Garvey uttered these words; and, in fact, the abbess herself, although she had tried to laugh the affair off, was evidently not at all pleased that the confessor should be able so easily to give her up to another.

Claude Duval listened to this little interlude with mingled feelings of curiosity and disgust. He felt all the curiosity which any man would feel, at finding himself thus, as it were, behind the scenes of conventual life, and disgust at the profligacy that was spoken of so coolly, as though it were quite a thing of course.

"I interrupt you," said the confessor, rising.

"No," said Duval. "Oh, no. I hope to hear from you, sir, some account of the sort of humour that this rather self-willed girl, Alicia, is in. Will it not be desirable to lose as little time as possible in the matter?"

"No time should be lost. The property is to be divided into thirds, I think."

"Fourths," said the abbess.

"Well, thirds or fourths, I don't know exactly which; but I am to have my share, and the sooner I get it the better."

CHAPTER CCCXLIX.

CLAUDE DUVAL PASSES A NIGHT IN THE CONVENT.

The Lady Abbess looked rather spitefully at Father Garvey, as she said—

"I am afraid, my dear friend, that you are rather selfish."

"Only afraid, are you?" said the monk. "Oh, I admit the fact in toto; Every one for himself, I rather think, is a well understood motto in this place."

The abbess smiled, and turning to Claude Duval, she said—

"You must not judge of Father Garvey by what you see of him to-night, my good sir. He is very much put out of his way at something."

Claude laughed.

"I hope that the holy father," he said, "will soon recover his serenity; but in the meantime, permit me to hope that there will be no difficulties in the way of inducing Alicia to sign the paper that I shall lay before her, and to ask you what you think will be the best way to set about it,"

"That is the question," said Father Garvey.

"It is no question at all," said the abbess, as her face assumed a strange expression. "We have ways and means of overcoming more obstinate natures than that of the fair Alicia. I only hope that there will be found no person connected with this establishment who will be led away from the due exercise of his duty by a foolish pity for one, who must be forced into doing that which it is our intent that she should do."

"If by that speech you allude to me," said the confessor, "your fears are quite groundless, I assure you. I am an advocate for the greatest rigour being exercised towards the girl."

"Is that possible?"

"It is so, and I will assist you in any way in my power."

"Then," cried the abbess with triumph, "I know what has happened."

"What?"

"She as repulsed you!"

The countenance of the confessor got several shades darker, and his small dark eyes seemed to retreat deeper beneath his overhanging brows. He clenched his fist and struck it upon the table, and seemed about to give utterance to some violent speech, but even at the moment that he opened his mouth to utter the words, a second thought came over him, and bowing his head he was silent.

"It is quite enough," said the abbess. "I am assured."

The confessor was still silent, and the abbess then struck a small silver bell, and the old nun who waited upon her made her appearance.

"Sister Martha," said the abbess, "you will conduct the prudent Alicia to the gray chamber at once."

Sister Martha made a low reverence, and left the room.

"Come," said the abbess, rising, "we will all see this obstinate girl, and you sir," turning to Claude, "can explain to her that by signing the paper which you are prepared to lay before her, she will be saving her life, and the life of the young man to whom she professes to have an attachment."

"You mean Field?" said Duval.

"I do. Can you tell us any news of him?"

"No, but Mr. Beachem is very much afraid that he is trying his utmost to find out where Alicia is."

"No doubt; but even should he discover that she is here, I don't think it is a piece of information that will very much assist him in his suit. But follow me, Mr. White, and you shall see this obstinate girl."

The Lady Abbess took in her hand a small silver lamp, and opening a concealed door in the apartment, she left it, followed by Duval and the confessor. Father Garvey crept up to Claude, and touched him on the arm.

"Well, sir?" said Claude.

"Hush! speak low. I only wanted to say, that if you had any notion of making friends with the abbess, and of coming here often, I have no objection."

"You are very good."

"Not at all. Alicia is for me. You understand that? When her mind, by a residence of some time longer in this place, is sufficiently subdued, she will easily yield to me. I have marked her for my own. And I won't interfere with you. Is that a bargain?"

"With all my heart," said Claude Duval.

"Agreed, then. I am glad we understand each other so well, but I, as a friend, beseech you to be careful. The abbess is a woman with the passion of a fiend."

"I thank you for the caution; but this conversation is imprudent just now, for she is straining her hearing to catch what she can of it."

"I have noticed that; but fear nothing. She is a little deaf."

"That is a good thing for us, then."

The abbess stopped at the door of a room which was at the end of rather a long narrow passage, floored with oak, and the walls of which were of the same material, highly polished.

The abbess touched a spring in the door, and it flew open rather sharply.

"Come in," she said, turning to Duval, "and don't believe one word of what Father Garvey has been saying to you against me."

"Madam, he said nothing against you. What he did say of you I feel myself constrained to believe. It was, that there was not a figure in the whole convent to be compared to yours, and he begged me to notice how truly majestic it was, which, however, he need not have done, for I could not fail to notice it without any prompting."

The abbess laughed, and shook her head, but it was evident that she was not at all displeased at the compliment.

"Capital—capital," whispered Father Garvey to Claude Duval. "You did that well."

"It was easy."

"Yes, but still it was well done."

Duval smiled to himself at the commendation of the confessor; but he had no further time to waste upon him as he was soon too much occupied with the proceedings of the Lady Abbess in the apartment to which she had conducted him.

The room itself was rather a small one, considering the size of the building in which it was situated, but it presented rather a curious aspect by being covered all over its walls by thick gray cloth, that hung in heavy folds from the ceiling to the floor.

There did not appear to be many windows to the room, as far as Claude Duval could then see, but it was just possible that there were, only that the gray curtains covered them up.

From the ceiling hung a bronze lamp, which cast a dreamy sort of light over the room, for it burnt but dimly.

In the centre of the floor was a small round table, and the other furniture of the room consisted of some three or four couches, and some few of the old high-backed awkward-looking chairs, such as were in the abbess's own room.

There was no one in this gray chamber, as the abbess called it, when she and the confessor and Duval entered it, but scarcely had the door with the spring closed behind them than another door opened at the opposite end of the room, and the long gray cloth hangings being pushed aside, Sister Martha appeared.

"Where is Alicia?" said the abbess.

"Madam, she will not come."

"Force her. There are surely enough of you to do that?"

"Yes, madam."

Sister Martha left the apartment, and Claude Duval turning to the abbess, said—

"Is this Alicia, then, so violent a young lady that she will not do what she don't feel inclined to?"

"No. Not violent at all. I am quite surprised at this message from her. She is delicate and gentle in appearance, and I did not expect much trouble with her."

"Those are just the spirits," said the confessor, "which, when once roused, you will always have the greatest trouble with. Ah, she comes!"

Claude Duval listened, and heard a clatter of voices, and a rushing of feet. The door again opened in the wall. Again the gray cloth was pushed aside, and four nuns appeared dragging along Alicia.

It could hardly be said that Alicia was resisting them, for she walked of her own accord; but still there was sufficient reluctance about her proceeding to show that it was a matter of force. One of the nuns had hold of her wrists, and the others pushed and dragged her forward into the room.

At the first glance at the lovely girl, Claude Duval felt that Field, the young lover, had very far from made any exaggeration in describing her beauty.

Alicia looked if anything a year or two younger than she really was. Her face was one of those pretty shaped ones which are rather wide across the eyes, and come delicately and sweetly small to the chin. It is a kind of face that is in nine cases out of ten spoiled by the chin being a trifle too long, which has the effect thus of giving a pointed expression to the lower part of the face; but such was not the case with Alicia. Her chin was sweetly rounded, and in perfect harmony with the rest of her features.

The soft and beautiful eyes were of the most charming blue that could be conceived, and she presented the rare contrast of very dark brown hair with those coloured eyes that really are only to be found in very fair people.

Claude Duval was quite charmed with the young girl; and yet it may be well supposed that, terrified and persecuted as she was in that convent, he saw her to the greatest possible disadvantage.

She did not at the first glance look to be above sixteen years of age; but after looking at her a little you could see that she was older than that, although all the charms of early youth were about her.

At the sight of the confessor Alicia shrunk back, exclaiming—

"No—no! Oh, no!"

"Silence!" said the Laby Abbess. "Leave us, dear sisters."

The four nuns bowed, and left the room. Alicia stood trembling, and evidently trying to keep up her courage.

"Child," said the Lady Abbess, "it is with pain that we hear you are still possessed with a spirit of rebellion."

"Rebellion!" said Alicia, and as she spoke her voice thrilled to the very heart of Claude Duval. "Rebellion, madam, do you call it to wish for life and liberty—to sigh for all that is pure and good in the great world that God has given to his creatures in lieu of all that is wicked and bad within these dreary walls? Oh, no—no! It would be rebellion against nature were I to affect to be pleased to stay here. I demand my freedom."

"Human nature," said the abbess, "is always demanding much."

"And don't get it," said the confessor.

"Silence!" said the abbess. "Let me speak to this recusant."

The confessor bowed and drew back.

"Alicia," began the abbess, "do you not know that your fate in life is in your own hands?"

"No, madam."

"I thought not. Come, we shall all be good friends soon, I daresay. All you have to do is to sign certain papers that this gentleman will place before you; and then as soon as our rules will permit, without bringing discredit upon the convent, you will be free to leave it."

As the abbess said "This gentleman," she pointed to Duval, who, stepping forward, bowed to Alicia very profoundly.

"Another?" said the girl. "Oh, how many persecutors am I to find in this dreadful place?"

"I am not one," said Claude.

"Nor I," said the confessor.

"Nor I," said the Lady Abbess. "On the contrary, we are all your dear friends, Alicia, if you will permit us to be such."

"Oh, no, no, no."

"But we say yes. Of course, you are young and inexperienced, and all we desire is that you should profit by our better knowledge of the world. Come, now, I felt assured from the first moment that you came here that you would soon be on the best of terms with all of us. Let us see whether or not we cannot arrange all this affair to the satisfaction of every one."

"Hold!" said Alicia. "Do not be so hasty, madam, in supposing that as yet you have driven me mad."

"Mad, do you say?"

"Yes, mad, for that seems to be the object of what you call your conventual discipline; but Heaven may give me strength yet to resist you. I will sign no papers."

"But, Alicia?"

"No, no, madam, I tell you I will sign no papers at all. The object of them is to rob me of all that is of right my own, and with which I would render independent one whom I feel desirous to be so. You may kill me, but I will not sign any documents whatever in this house. I defy you all!"

CHAPTER CCCL.

ALICIA IS FOUND CONTUMACIOUS, AND DEALT WITH ACCORDINGLY.

THE confessor, as Alicia thus spoke, grinned maliciously; but the Lady Abbess looked the very picture of rage.

"Wretch!" she cried—"no; I am wrong."

With a wonderful command over herself the abbess at once changed her tone, and in quite a mild voice she added—

"Alicia, you speak under mistaken feelings, I feel well assured. It is quite out of the question to be able to explain to you the many advantages that will result to you from signing the papers that will be laid before you. But I can and will explain to you what you will suffer by your obstinacy."

"I will not yield," said Alicia.

"In the first place," said the abbess, "you will be confined in one of our cells, which are specially constructed for such sinners as you are. Of course, we shall all pray for you, but that is all we can possibly do. The light of Heaven will never again shine upon you; and, in company with the rat and the toad, you will live and you will die!"

Alicia turned deadly pale.

"He whom you, with your girlish simplicity, think you love, will never see you more; but if he knew that you yourself had by your obstinacy here produced such a result, he would rather curse than reverence the memory of the lady that so treated him, and made it impossible that he could be happy with another."

"Oh, no—no!" sobbed Alicia.

"But I say yes!" cried the abbess, in a voice that rang through the apartment. "I say yes. Does he whom you affect to love only love you for the wealth that you so pertinaciously cling to? Is it that he may be enabled to live upon your money that he seeks your hand?"

"No—no, you don't know him."

"But I know you. Listen to me, girl. Suppose you had been poor—suppose it possible that you had had nothing to subsist upon but what thousands of others have, namely, the proceeds of your own industry—would you then have loved him?"

"I would—I would!"

"Would you then have refused to share with him his joys and his sorrows?"

"Oh, no—no."

"Then why do you now object to signing documents which will at once release you to do as you please, and yet leave you independence? We will not be trifled with. In a word, sign the papers that this gentleman will lay before you, or consider this to be your prison for life."

"Can this be possible? Am I in England?"

"Oh, yes. We can answer in the affirmative to both of those propositions. You will do well to consider your decision."

"I have considered!"

"And what is the result?"

"That I will not sign away that property which is mine own."

"Be it so."

The Lady Abbess advanced upon Alicia, and in her passion would have struck her; but Claude Duval was not going quietly to permit that, so he suddenly interfered, saying—

"My dear madam, I think that I can say something which will induce the young lady to consent."

"Oh, in that case—"

"No—no," said Alicia, "you can say nothing. I will not hear you."

The abbess was too much exasperated to say more to her, but clapping her hands together, she cried out—

"Where are ye, holy children—where are ye? Come to the aid of the fold. Come to the truth, and hide in darkness the heretic and the traducer."

The four nuns on the moment made their appearance, and one of them, who was the ugliest being that Claude Duval thought he had ever seen in the shape of woman, sprang upon poor Alicia like a tiger, and twined her long skinny fingers in the hair of the young girl, as she cried out—

"Oh, the sinner! Oh, the sinner! To the glory of the saints, the sinner shall perish for ever."

"And ever," said Father Garvey, in a deep sepulchral voice.

"Away with her," said the abbess; and then suddenly turning to Claude, she whispered, "we will soon frighten her into a compliance with our wishes. She don't know yet what our vaults are."

"Have you vaults?" said Claude, affecting to speak in the most indifferent possible manner to the abbess.

"Have we vaults? To be sure we have. I thought, Mr. White, you could have no sort of doubt upon that subject. Away with her—away with her at once!"

The other nuns seized poor Alicia, who, in that moment of despair, called out in shrieking accents—

"Oh, save me—save me! Henry Field, where are you now? Oh, God, look with pity upon me!"

"Away with her!" cried the abbess. "Away with the wretch!"

The nuns dragged Alicia from the room, and Claude Duval could hear her utter shrieks as they bore her away from the apartment through a number of narrow passages.

It had required all the strength of mind he possessed to enable him to resist the impulse to spring forward and cast his arm round the waist of the young girl, and defy them all. But reflection told him that to do so would be very indiscreet, indeed, for the result could only be that he would have to fight his way out of the nunnery, the topography of which he was profoundly ignorant, and that in his route, which might be wrong or right as chance might dictate, he would be exposed to every possible peril, and both he and Alicia would, in all probability, fall victims to his want of patience.

"You see of what materials," said the abbess, "our fair Alicia is composed, Mr. White."

"I do, indeed," said Claude Duval.

"Curses on her obstinacy! If by any possible means she could be induced to sign the papers, conveying her property from herself, she would soon cease to be of any trouble to us."

"You would really let her go then?"

"Let her go?"

"Let her go?" echoed the confessor.

"Oh, dear, no," added the abbess; "we are not in the habit of letting any on go, Mr. White."

"What would you do then with her?"

The abbess pointed with her finger to the floor, and the confessor nodded.

"I do not quite understand," said Claude.

"I have no objection to tell you," said the abbess, as she took a seat and began to fan herself after her exertions. "If she once signed the documents, which you know how to prepare, she would not live long. That is what I mean. But, curses on her, as long as she refuses to sign them, her life is too valuable to tamper with. That is the whole case."

"I quite understand it," said Claude; "and now permit me to ask of you the permission to see her alone. I have an argument that I can, I think, use with success, to induce her to consent."

"What is it?" said the confessor, with a short, dry cough.

"Ay, what is it?" said the abbess.

"I will tell you: I should not have mentioned it at all if I had not meant to tell you, and it is just this:—I suppose that she really does believe that if she were to sign that paper in dispute she would be let go free."

"I suppose so," said the abbess; "but if she does think that, it is a very great mistake."

"Doubtless; but what, now, if I were to see her alone, and tell her that I am moved to pity at her position, and would do all in my power to aid her; and that I would depose to the fact that she signed the paper under durance, and so vitiate the signature, but that she had better do so at once for the sake of freedom. Do you think that would do?"

"It might," said the abbess.

"And it might not," said the confessor.

"Which," said Claude, "is a very sapient remark to come from you, learned sir."

"Can we trust you, sir?"

"You have trusted me so far already," said Claude Duval, "that it is much better to go on than attempt for a moment to draw back. Besides, I rather think that my interests are too much wound up with those of the Beachem family for me to act otherwise than in accordance with their interests."

"That is true," said the abbess, as she gave the confessor a look of intelligence, to which he responded with a nod. "That is quite true; and you shall have the opportunity you ask for, Mr. White, of making the experiment you suggest."

Claude Duval could hardly conceal his exultation at this success; but when he came to consider, there was a something about that look that had passed between the confessor and the abbess that he did not quite like.

"When shall it be?" he said.

"In a couple of hours," said the abbess. "By that time Alicia will have had some slight taste of the atmosphere of our cells."

"Good," said Claude. "That will, no doubt, place her in such a frame of mind, that she will be glad to welcome anything that looks like a chance of escape."

"Perhaps so," said the confessor, cunningly—"perhaps so."

"What," said Claude, "doubting again?"

"Sir, I did not speak to you."

"And I feel quite sure that I have no desire to speak to you; but I appeal to the Lady Abbess whether it will not be very desirable, pending the little experiment I wish to make upon the fears and credulity of Alicia, to take care that Father Garvey does not pay her a visit."

"He dare not now," said the abbess.

Father Garvey silently bowed his head, but about his lips there was a covert smile, and there was a twinkle of his eyes which looked like mischief.

The abbess led the way back to her own apartment, and Claude and the confessor followed; but when the Lady Abbess reached the door, she stepped aside, and motioned to Claude Duval to go in, and then facing the confessor, she made a very elaborate curtsey, and said—

"Good-night."

The confessor kept his countenance well, and holding forth both his arms, as if he invoked a blessing on the head of the abbess, he said—

"Good-night, holy sister. The peace of the saints be with you."

The abbess slammed the door of the chamber in his face, and then stamping with rage, she cried out—

"I hate him—I hate him!—Oh, how I hate that man! You can have no notion of how much I hate that man, Mr. White."

"He is not the most loveable person in the world," said Claude. "I don't wonder at your getting rid of him."

The abbess laughed at Duval in a peculiar manner, as she said—

"Before I send for Alicia and allow you to speak with her in private, which I intend to do, I wish to ask you some questions."

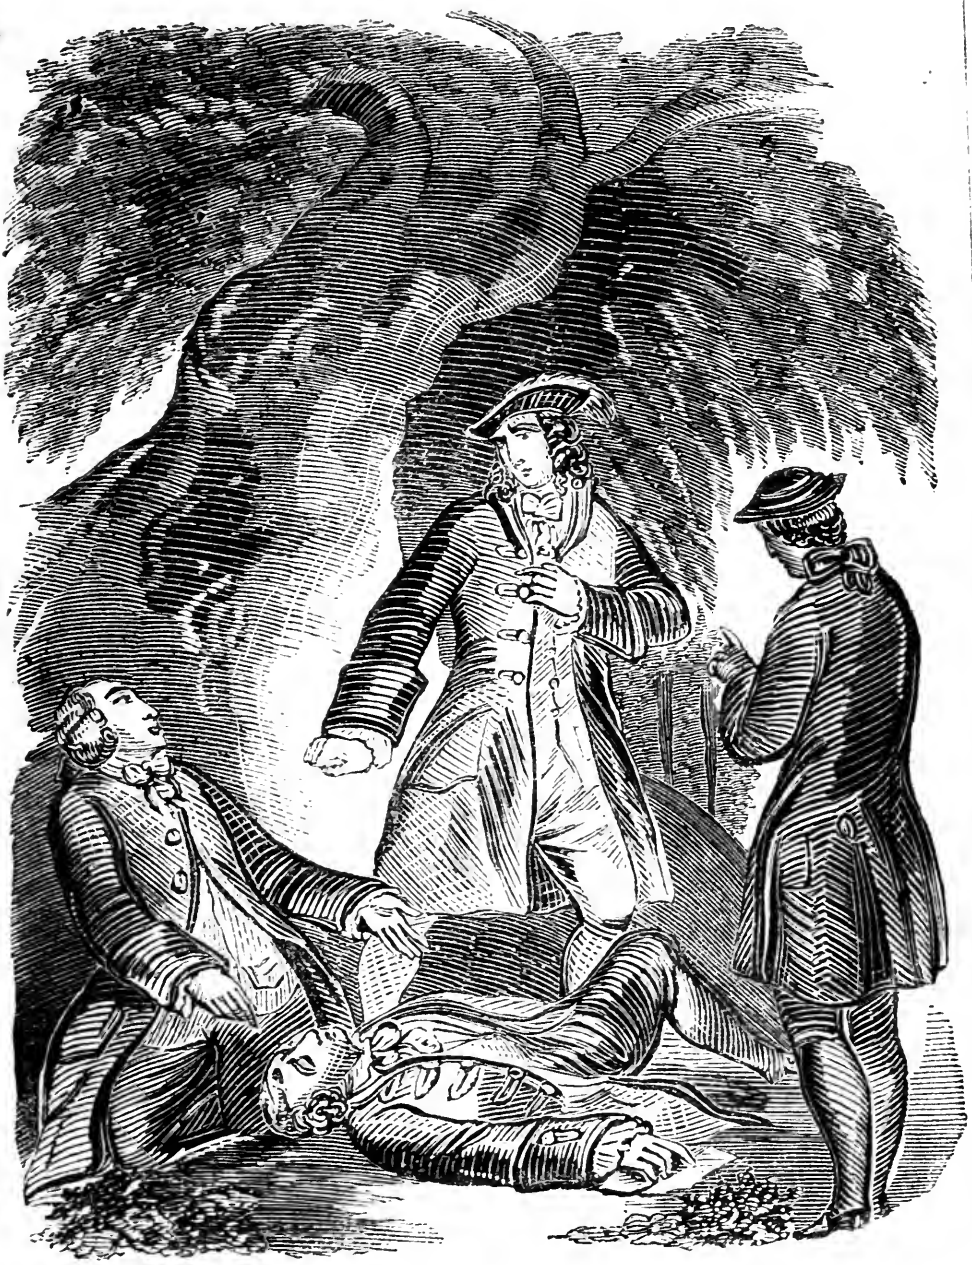
"I am quite willing to answer them," said Claude.

The abbess seated herself in a chair that was very elaborately carved, and motioned to Duval to occupy another close at hand; and then she said, with a tone of great seriousness—

"Father Garvey means mischief."

"To whom?"

"To you and to Alicia; but to you first."



"He had better be careful."

"He will be careful, you may depend. He is a priest, and as such he never forgives an injury. He thinks that you have done him one, you may depend, and, therefore, he will not forgive you."

"What injury have I done to him? I never saw him before in all my life."

"Very likely not; but, you must know, that he does me the honour to admire me very much, and, I am sure, by the glance of his eye, that he is of opinion you have supplanted him in my regards."

"A broad hint this," thought Claude Duval, and then he said, aloud, "Madam,

THE DEATH OF SIR JOHN BEACHEM.

if I thought that indeed it were possible to hold a place in your affections I should begin to consider myself one of the happiest of men; but, alas, I fear that it is out of the question."

"Not at all—oh, not at all. But we will speak more of this when the affair of Alicia is disposed of. We must attend to that in the first place; but what I wanted to say to you with regard to Father Garvey was, that really it would be no bad thing if you induced him to leave the country."

CHAPTER CCCLI.

FATHER GARVEY VISITS ALICIA IN THE CONVENT CELLS.

CLAUDE DUVAL looked a little surprised at these words from the abbess, for how it was possible that he could induce Father Garvey to leave the country he could not for a moment conceive.

"How can I so far influence him," he said, "as to get him out of the country?"

"Easily."

"Well, with all due submission to you, madam, it certainly appears to me that I am about the last person to whom he would listen upon this occasion."

"Not at all. If a person should be removed from any particular spot of earth, whether they be taken from it to another, or carried upward, or placed beneath it, they will be to all intents and purposes equally removed from the country."

"If placed beneath it?"

"Yes."

"I think I understand you."

"I know you do. Hark you, Mr. White, if you think that my favour and my friendship and countenance are worth the having, you will have to get rid of Father Garvey, or he will get rid of you."

"I am very much obliged for the hints you give me upon the subject," said Claude Duval, "and shall take good care of myself accordingly."

"You must do more—you must take care of him. Listen to me. It is the intention of Father Garvey to visit Alicia in the cell to which she is by this time conveyed."

"Are you sure of that?"

"I am as sure as if he had told me. I saw it in his eye; so you need not doubt it. Now, I want you to follow him, not only to hear what he will say to the girl, but to give you an opportunity of disposing of him. After you have accomplished both these purposes, you can come back to me in this room, and I shall be glad to see you, and to send for the girl for the purpose of your trying your plan to make her sign the papers."

Claude Duval was secretly delighted at this arrangement of the abbess's, since it well enough chimed in with his own views of what it would be highly desirable to do with regard to the present posture of affairs. The only difficulty that struck him at the moment consisted in the fact of his total ignorance of the interior of the convent.

"I will in all things obey you," said Claude; "but I fear that I hardly know how to set about it."

"How mean you?"

"I mean, that I am a stranger to the topography of the convent, and, therefore, if I were to start this moment upon the expedition to find Father Garvey, I could not do so."

"All particulars of that chamber shall be placed in your way; but you must promise me that you will kill him."

"I will."

"Upon your soul?"

"Oh, yes, upon my soul—if he won't be quiet by any other means," added Claude to himself.

"Then I am satisfied," said the abbess. "Take this key—you see that there is a set of wards at each end of it. One or other of those wards will open any door in the convent. I cannot particularise which will open which; but it will not consume much time to take the other, if one should fail. Now follow me."

"With pleasure," said Duval, as he took the key, which was a very ancient one indeed. "I feel as if I should like now to do what I daresay I shall not be able to resist the doing, and that is, to follow you for the remainder of my life."

"Are you serious?"

"I am, indeed."

"How can I prove that?"

"I don't think there is any difficulty. In the first place, you see, that I have eyes in my head, and in the next you can easily look into a mirror, and then you will see yourself; and I would ask you, then, how it is possible for any one blessed with sight to do other than admire you?"

The abbess patted him upon the arm, as with a smile she said—

"I think it a happy chance that brought you here. I assure you I feel that we shall be very great friends. Follow me now. I am anxious to get all this affair over, which cannot be considered to be the case till both Father Garvey and Alicia are no more."

The compliments which Claude Duval had paid to the personal charms of the abbess had had the effect of completely winning her heart, and she looked upon the handsome attorney, Mr. White, as she thought him, as a lover whom she valued more than any she had ever known.

Her anxiety to get rid of Father Garvey increased each moment, and she hastened to place Duval in a position that would enable him to satisfy her that the confessor was no more.

Claude followed her out at another door than that through which they had before passed from the room; and after crossing a corridor, which contained a few pictures of saints, and which was dimly lighted by a lamp that burnt before a statue of the Virgin, the abbess turned abruptly upon Duval, as she said—

"The key."

"It is here," he replied, "but I hope you will give it to me again, for I regard it as a proof of your confidence."

"Assuredly," she replied. "You shall have it again, quickly enough. I am only about to convince you of its usefulness, by opening a door with it."

By the dim rays of light emitted by the lamp in the niche, where was the figure of the Virgin, the abbess now sought for a small door, which was so cunningly contrived in the wainscot of the wall that if one had not known it had been there, it might be passed a thousand times, and the keyhole, which was hidden by the ornamental portion of the frame of a picture, would never have met the sight.

The abbess turned the key in the lock, and a tall narrow door opened in the wall, showing beyond it complete darkness.

"Follow," she said. "Follow me, and fear nothing."

"With you I cannot fear anything," said Claude, "but to lose you."

"That is a mistaken fear."

Claude found that after proceeding only a couple of paces through this door in the wall, he came to some stairs, and he rather shrunk back, as he said—

"Are we to descend far?"

"No, only four steps."

"Is that all?"

"It is so. Come on. There you are at the foot of the stairs. Now wait a moment, for I must be guided by my hand, since all here is in darkness."

A sudden sound made Claude Duval start. It was the door that they had passed through, which had closed with a snap. It was intended to close at once, when let go, but the hinges were rusty, and the spring in the same condition, no doubt, so it had taken some time to close.

"It is only the door," said the abbess. "I ought to have closed it. Ah, here is the keyhole—all is well. Do not utter a word, unless I tell you that you may do so with safety."

"I will obey you."

Another door now was opened by the abbess, and Claude Duval felt a rush of cold air upon his face, which was really very pleasant, after the confined atmosphere he had been for some time breathing, for the interior of the convent altogether was closely shut up, so that but little fresh air circulated in it.

Duval would fain have said, "Where are you now?" but as the abbess had enjoined silence upon him, he thought that it was better to keep quiet, and he said nothing at all, but strove to pierce with his eyes the mass of gloom that was before him.

The abbess did not speak, but she took him by the arm, and led him forward a pace or two, and then he heard her closing the door behind her, so that it should not make any noise in so doing.

Gradually he began to be able to see a little about him, and then he became sensible that he was in some rather large space, in which there was a dim reflected light from somewhere, but he could not tell where it came from.

"Hush!" said the abbess, very softly. "Stay here till I come back."

"Yes," said Duval, in a similar low tone of voice.

She left him, and each moment he could see more clearly about him, and he became certain that he was in the chapel of the convent, and that he was not far from the high altar, which was a little to the right of him.

Whatever reflections and cogitations this change of place might have given rise to in the mind of Duval, was put a stop to by the voice of the abbess, who said in a canting, hypocritical tone—

"Is there any holy sister here to whom I can afford consolation and advice? If so, let them speak."

A deep groan proceeded from a corner of the chapel; and then a voice said—

"Holy mother, I am here—Sister Ann. I am repeating the prayer of penance."

"Did Father Garvey enjoin thee?"

"Yes—oh, yes!"

"It is well I sought you. He desires that you now retire to your cell to finish the penance prayer. Go at once."

"I go—I go," said the voice.

Through the misty light Claude Duval saw the tall form of somebody in black glide past him, and then all was still. The nun had left the chapel, so that the abbess was free to act as she thought proper.

"Mr. White?" she said.

"Here," replied Duval.

"Come this way. Hem! Can't you see me?"

"No."

"Then you will shortly. I am afraid to turn the lamp, which now sheds most of its beams away from the chapel. You can be guided by my voice. Be careful of the steps that are before you."

Duval, guided as she had said by the voice of the Lady Abbess, walked forward and ascended what he supposed to be the steps of the altar. In a few moments she held him by the arm, as she said—

"I can see you well enough."

"And I you now," said Duval. "My eyes are getting accustomed to the obscurity of the place. Is this a chapel?"

"It is. I find that you can see that much. Speak low; for although I have every reason to suppose that I have removed the only person who was in this place, yet it is impossible that I can be quite certain upon that subject."

"Thank you for the caution," said Claude Duval. "I will hold it in mind. And now will you tell me why I am brought here?"

The abbess laughed strangely, as she said—

"You don't fancy it is to say your prayers, do you?"

"Hardly that," replied Claude.

"Well, then, it is that you may be enabled to follow your foe, the confessor, and my foe likewise, as I know well he is. In order to get to the vaults, in which Alicia is a prisoner, he must pass through this chapel. He will have a light, as a thing of course, and that will enable you to see him, and follow him. Wrapt up as he will be in the object that brings him here, and not at all suspecting that he is followed by you, he will not be very suspicious; but still, despite that, I advise you to be very cautious, as, before you kill him, I wish you to hear every word that he says to Alicia."

"I understand you."

"Of course you do. Your professional experiences are such as not to deaden your conception of such little matters as these, and I feel quite certain that you will execute what you undertake with due discretion. There remains now but one other subject to settle."

"What is that, madam?"

"How do you propose to yourself to take the life of the confessor? Are you armed?"

Duval did not choose to tell the Lady Abbess that he was amply provided with arms, offensive or defensive; for it did not look very lawyer-like to be in such a state of readiness for a fray, so he merely said—

"I think, if I once get hold of him by the throat, that he will find a very considerable difficulty in getting away again."

"No—no, that will not do."

"Well, madam, I am open to any suggestion that your better experience may enable you to make to me upon this subject."

"Take this."

"What is it?"

"A poniard. It will not fail you, you may depend. I think, that after you have heard all that there is to hear, you had better at once step up to the confessor and leave this in his back."

"I daresay that would do."

"It would be sure to do, and nothing is easier. I tell you, that I hate the man, and must and will be rid of him. I shall think the better of you if you aid me in this business; but if, at the last moment, as I know people are apt to do, you falter at it, I will do it myself at the first opportunity that offers."

"Make yourself easy," said Claude Duval. "I will dispose of the confessor."

Duval made this promise to the Lady Abbess, but he certainly had no sort of idea of carrying it out in the way she dictated. That it would be very desirable to get the confessor out of the way, Duval fully felt; but he shrank from assassination, and left it to good fortune to point out some other mode of disposing of the very pious and holy Father Garvey.

CHAPTER CCCLII.

DUVAL FINDS THE WAY TO THE VAULTS OF THE CONVENT.

The dagger with which the Lady Abbess so kindly furnished Claude Duval for the destruction of the confessor, was, in good truth, a most murderous weapon, and Claude, as he passed his hand along the blade, felt that it would very speedily, indeed, accomplish the object of the Lady Abbess's even in the most unskilled hands.

There is very little doubt but that if he had let the abbess know how very much averse he was to the use of such an implement, she would not have been at all particular about giving him a taste of it; but Claude Duval took care to keep that state of things to himself.

It did not take him much trouble to thoroughly understand the abbess. She was one of those women of wicked passions, who have always some friend and lover for the time being, but who are always ready to throw him aside for a new one who might strike her fancy at the moment.

The death of the old lover was, then, the very best and most ready mode of disposing of him ; and what so politic as to employ the new one upon such an enterprise?

It was very probable that Father Garvey might have disposed of his predecessor, and, no doubt, he would have had much less scruples about the mode of doing so than Duval had.

The little conversation that had taken place between Duval and the abbess was conducted in very rapid whispers, so that it did not take long in coming to an end, and then the abbess said to him—

"Now, you quite understand me. When you have done all that you have to do, you can come to me in my own room ; or suppose I say, that I will be waiting for you in the corridor through the two secret doors ?"

"That will do," said Claude, "provided I can find the doors."

"That you will do easily, knowing the position of them. There is yonder lamp which you can take possession of, as it will aid you on your return. Here is the key that I before gave you."

"A thousand thanks. And now, madam, I beg that you will consider your orders as obeyed to the letter."

"Be it so."

The abbess glided away like a ghost, but where she went to Claude could not in the obscurity of the chapel take upon himself to say. He thought in his own mind, that it was highly probable she had some other mode of getting to her own apartment than by the secret doors leading to the corridor.

Situated as he now was, Duval became perfectly alive to the slightest sound which should be indicative of the approach of the confessor. He had a fear that Father Garvey might glide into the chapel, and pass out again without being seen, and that made him so anxious, that he started at the slightest noise that occurred within the convent.

This state of things lasted a considerable time, till a strange rattling kind of sound came upon Claude's ears, which for a few moments rather confused him, till the idea occurred to him that it was rain upon the roof of the chapel. By listening intently, he thought, too, that he could hear the roaring of wind among the trees in the convent garden.

"A rough night," thought Claude.

Like a star amid the obscurity of the chapel, Duval suddenly saw a faint light at the farther end of it, and he crouched down upon the steps of the altar, to watch its progress.

Slowly marching up one of the aisles came a dim figure, the outlines of which were so very indistinct, that Duval could not take upon himself to say whether it was the confessor or not ; but he was soon satisfied.

As the figure approached, the star-like light that it carried shed a dim radiance around it, and then as it once paused, and the little flame of the hand-lamp was allowed to steady itself, it burnt much more clearly, and Father Garvey, attired in his gown, with the cowl partially drawn over his face and head, stood revealed to the gaze of Duval

It appeared by the attitude of the confessor, that he was listening to the sounds that were indicative of a storm without.

During the few moments that he did so pause, Claude Duval had a good look about the chapel, as well as at the priest, for the light that Father Garvy carried each moment burnt with a clearer flame.

The convent chapel was in good truth a rather gorgeous place. The appointments were all in the highest style of florid gothic art, and from the glance that he, Duval, took at the altar that was close to him, he could see that it was quite a blaze of gold and velvet.

Duval, however, was too anxious to look well at the confessor, and to watch him and his movements, to waste much time in studying the appointments of the chapel, although he would have been well pleased to have done so.

After muttering something to himself, as the wind roared and shrieked over the chapel roof, the confessor glanced at his lamp, and came slowly on.

Claude was afraid that he was on the point of coming up the steps of the altar to the very spot where he stood, and he thought it desirable to creep behind the altar; but before he could accomplish that movement the confessor turned aside, and walked up to a portion of the wall of the aisle.

Duval watched him anxiously.

The confessor placed the lamp upon a little bracket that was fastened to the wall, and then Claude heard a rattling sound, like that which might be produced by a key in a lock, and then in a very mysterious kind of way the confessor suddenly disappeared, and all was darkness in the chapel, save a faint kind of reflected halo, that came from the spot where the confessor had so suddenly and strangely disappeared.

Deeply interested at all this, and fearful of losing sight altogether of Father Garvey, Claude crept forward as noiselessly as he possibly could towards the place and then he soon got a solution of the apparent mystery.

The bracket upon which Father Garvey had placed his lamp was fastened to a small iron door which he had opened, so that by the act of opening it the lamp, had been carried inwards with the door, as that was the way it moved.

The confessor himself was just upon the threshold or the top of a small, narrow flight of stairs, as Duval afterwards saw, and was in an attitude of listening intently with his hand up to his left ear.

A corinthian column that was close at hand, and which formed one of the supports to the arched and richly ornamented roof of the chapel, now afforded to Claude Duval a very convenient place of hiding in, and by just peeping round its convexity a little he could watch the proceedings of the priest.

After listening in this way for any sound that might come up from the subterranean passage beneath the chapel, the confessor put his head out into the sacred building again, and listened for about the space of a minute in that direction.

To hear more acutely he had thrown the cowl back from over his head and face, and as the rays of the lamp fell upon him, Claude Duval had a good view for once in the way of the undisguised features and aspect of a man who probably never, except by such an accident, was seen by human eyes unless he was playing a part that was pleasing to his real feelings.

Such an expression of frightful, satyr-like sensuality upon the face of any human being Claude had never seen. The low forehead—the thick lips—the strange, rolling eyes, and the general expression of the priest's face, were those that are given in some of the paintings of the old masters to the grinning heads that are represented peeping through clefts of trees, or peering down far amid masses of luxuriant foliage at some nymph reposing, and seeking a bath in some refreshing stream in the depths of a forest.

Claude Duval shuddered to look at the man, who, by the ignorant and the bigotted, was, no doubt, esteemed quite a holy person.

But here we would not have our readers mistake us, and suppose that in recording the fact that Father Garvey, who lived some hundred years ago, was a real type of the Catholic priesthood. On the contrary, we believe, and we know that there are many highly intellectual and excellent men belonging to that fraternity; but what we do mean to show is, that the conventual system permitted the existence of such men as the confessor, and of such woman as the abbess.

Having satisfied himself that, beyond the sound of the rain upon the roof of the chapel, all was still, the confessor turned again, and taking the lamp off the bracket, he descended a few steps further, so as to be clear of the door, and then closed it.

A double darkness seemed to fall upon the chapel.

This was a state of things, of course, which was not at all calculated to frustrate Duval's views, so he at once stepped forward and felt for the key-hole of the little iron door. For a few moments he was rather puzzled to find it, as a loose piece of ornamental iron hung over it; but as he felt that yield to his touch, he guessed at once that it was only a shield to the key-hole, and in another moment he was carefully trying the key that the lady abbess had given him in the lock.

A pang of disappointment came across the mind of Claude, as he found that the key, instead of opening the door for him, turned round and round in the lock without exercising the slightest influence on it. At the moment, he forgot that it was a master-key that he had with a set of wards at each end of it; but it was only for a moment that this lapse of memory took place, and then he rapidly turned the key.

The lock yielded in a moment, and the little iron door opened.

Claude Duval now felt all the necessity of caution for more reasons than one. In the first place, Father Garvey was, no doubt, perfectly acquainted with all the intricacies of that underground portion of the convent; and so, if he had any suspicions that he was watched, might easily elude him, Claude.

In the second place, if he were only once to discover that his visit to Alicia was found out by the man whom he believed to be his enemy, there was no knowing but he might take the life of the innocent young girl to avenge himself.

For these reasons, Claude Duval was as cautious as it was possible for any human being to be, as he proceeded upon the ticklish and somewhat perilous adventure.

Even as Father Garvey had projected his head from the narrow passage on the other side of the secret door to listen in the chapel, so did Claude Duval project his head from the chapel to listen in the secret passage.

All was still.

A new dread, however, soon came over the heart of Claude Duval, and that was, the possibility that, while he was being so over-cautious in listening that the priest did not suspect his presence, he, Garvey, might reach the victim of the persecutions of the convent, and torment her with his insolent addresses, without he, Claude, being able, amid the intricacies of the place, to find the cell.

No sooner did this notion find a home in the heart of Duval, than he hurried forward at once after the confessor.

Two steps from the entrance to that mysterious region there commenced a flight of stairs—so narrow and so steep were those stairs, that only one person could descend with anything like ease at a time, and that one required to be specially careful how he went on lest he should slip from the narrow step he trod upon, in which case, the probability of his falling all the way was very strong, indeed.

Claude was very careful; but he had the disadvantage of being in the dark, so that he shuddered with a strange sort of dread as he went step by step down there, as it were, into the bowels of the earth, and still found no termination to the steps.

He regretted much that he had not begun to count the steps from the top; but now it was too late to do so, and the idea of going back for such an object as that was not to be thought of.

Down, still down went Duval, till he made sure that some fifty feet at least had been descended from the level of the chapel floor, and then he felt that he was no longer on the stone steps that he had wished so devoutly at an end.

He drew a long breath of relief.

"At last," he whispered to himself—"at last I have reached the foot of this staircase; but where is the confessor?"

That was, indeed, a question, for the place in which Claude Duval now found himself was profoundly dark, and no confessor was to be found at hand.

The floor was evidently of earth merely. No doubt it was hammered down hard and flat; but still it was only earth. The air was very cold, and at the same time there was a strange sickly odour about it that laid hold of the senses of Duval, and seemed to deprive him of one half his strength.

CLAUDE DISGUISES HIMSELF FOR HIS EXPEDITION TO THE CONVENT.

"If one should chance now," he thought, "to faint in such a place as this, there would be no further hope. Death would be certain. I must not think of such horrors."

By an effort Claude shook off the strange feelings that were crowding about his heart, and he listened intently.

CHAPTER CCCLIII.

THE HORRORS OF THE CONVENT VAULTS TRANSCEND CLAUDE'S IMAGINATION.

As Claude Duval, in a crouching attitude at the foot of the long dreary stairs, listened for any sound that might enable him to guess the whereabouts of the priest, he suddenly heard a pattering kind of noise.

At first he could not make out what it could mean; but as he listened he felt convinced that it was the fall of water from some great height in drops into some pool that it had formed.

That afforded him no indication of the way which the confessor had taken, and he was about, with the hope that chance might direct him, to proceed cautiously forward, when there came a rushing sound, and he felt something pass over his feet.

Some unmistakable squeaks from rats engaged in a fight with each other convinced him that what the abbess had said of the reptile inhabitants of that region was by no means an overdrawn picture.

And yet, much as Duval detested those creatures about him, he felt it almost a relief, amid the stern solitude of that place, to find aught in the shape of life there.

"I will proceed," he said to himself. "Surely I shall hear something of the confessor. This place cannot be so very large."

At that moment there came a dim flash of light on the scene, and from a long vaulted passage to the left of where he stood, Claude heard the sound of hasty footsteps.

The light increased each moment in power.

That this was Father Garvey, for some reason or another, on his return to that spot, Duval could not for a moment doubt; and as he did not wish just then to encounter the priest, he glanced around him for some place of shelter

The vaulted passage along which the confessor was coming, went past the end of the staircase, and so right on into an obscurity which Claude could nor penetrate with his eyes.

Upon rather the impulse of the moment, than from any reflection that that would be the best thing he could do, Claude ran down the darkest portion of the passage, and finding that there were small gothic doors upon each side, he pushed at one of them.

The door gave way, and Duval fell headlong down a height of about three feet, on to what felt like damp straw.

Fearful that the noise of his fall might alarm the confessor, Duval would not move, but he listened with all the intensity in his power for any sound that might enlighten him as to the state of affairs in the passage he had left.

The gothic door that Duval had pushed open, and then fallen through, was not above twenty paces from the foot of the stairs, so that when the confessor passed at that latter point with his light, a faint ray or two of it found its way to where Claude lay.

By that faint ray, he could just see that he was in a little vaulted apartment about twelve feet square, and that there was a wide bench in one corner on which was standing a jug, and a piece of stale bread; the floor was covered with straw in a very scanty manner; the place had evidently been used as a prison for some unfortunate. The confessor either heard, or fancied he heard some noise, and proceeded cautiously to look all around him, holding the lamp in his hand above his head, and endeavouring to pierce the gloom that reigned in that place. He approached the passage which Claude had just traversed, and began to examine the cells in a very cautious manner, and if he had continued his search as he began it, without doubt he must have found Duval; but he did not.

"I certainly heard the noise of something like a heavy body falling; but perhaps it was some of the old plaster giving way. I do not like searching these vaults," he said.

As he spoke, he turned slowly round; and Claude saw, or fancied that he saw him tremble as he did so.

"The fellow is a coward, after all," thought Duval.

"I am certain I heard some sound from here," added the priest; "and yet, what or who could it possibly be? Not the abbess, surely? and she and I only could visit these places at such an hour as this."

With a wild rush, a whole legion of large grey rats now darted past the confessor, and fled screeching and squalling along another passage to the right.

"Curses on the vermin!" he said. "So it was the rats, after all, that once more have filled me with fears in this place? If I came oftener, which, thank the fates, I do not, I suppose I should get a little used to them. Confound them! Well, well, it was better to come back and know what it really was before I went to the cell of Alicia."

With these words, the confessor slowly moved towards the direction from whence he came.

As he went, Duval could still hear him, amid the intense silence of that place, muttering to himself—

"Yes; she shall be mine—mine only! We never yet had in our [illegible] these walls any one to be compared to her in beauty. Wonderful—wonderful!"

Claude scrambled out of the dungeon, the floor of which was so much lower than the passage which led to it.

"Is it wonderful?" he said to himself. "I will let you find out that there is something more wonderful, still, in the whole proceeding than the beauty of Alicia. I feel quite obliged to the rats for making disturbance enough to bring the holy father back again to this spot, for now I can with ease follow him."

Nothing could be easier, now, guided by the light that Father Garvey carried, for Claude Duval to follow him along the narrow passage he was pursuing.

It was astonishing now with what complete security the confessor seemed to proceed. The discovery that it was the rats that had made all the noise appeared so completely to satisfy him, that it is doubtful if anything but a human voice would now have had the effect of inducing him to turn his head.

This was all, so far, in Claude's favour.

The passage was about sixty feet in length, and then it suddenly widened out into a large gloomy looking vaulted apartment, which was some thirty or forty feet across it in one direction, that is to say, opposite to the end of the passage, while right and left it was quite lost in the darkness, so wide was it in both of those directions.

The confessor paused.

Claude Duval now hoped that his perseverance in following Father Garvey would be crowned with success, for it was evident the priest was near to the cell he meant to visit.

Turning round slowly the confessor held up the light, and took a keen glance around him. Then he muttered—

"So! this is the place that they all shudder at, and pretend is haunted—haunted with the spirits of the nuns and the novices who have here come by death, and of the children who have perished in the well. Haunted! Ha! I fear not these idle tales of superstition, not I."

A deep groan sounded audibly from out of the intense darkness; but whether it came from the right or from the left Duval could not say.

The confessor appeared to be equally unable to fix the locality of the sound, for he looked about him rather wildly, and then uttered a cry of terror as he sunk almost to the damp floor, and trembled excessively.

"Serves you right," thought Duval. "The more frightened such a rascal as you are the better."

"What was it?—what was it?" said the confessor in a thick and husky whisper. "I thought I heard a something. Oh, what was it?"

All was still again as the grave.

"No—no!" he added, "it was only imagination, or the rats again—yes, the rats again. Oh, fool—fool that I am to allow myself to be thus played upon by my over-acute senses. It is nothing—oh, it is nothing!"

He rose to his feet again, and looked rather anxiously at the lamp, which was burning but dimly.

"It is the bad air here," he muttered, "that affects the flame of the lamp. I will go to the cell of Alicia at once. I must take her out of this place, for it is paying too dear a price even for her sweet society to visit her here."

Again the dismal groan came upon the dusky air.

The confessor did not utter any cry this time; but he shrunk back, and Claude could see his eyes glaring into the obscurity far away to the right of where he stood.

"The well—the well!" he said. "Surely it comes from the well. No—no! Death only is there. This place should be still as death, for what is it but one great grave?"

With a shuddering horror the priest now looked about him, and then passing his disengaged hand across his brow, he muttered—

"Let me think—oh, let me think. What other inhabitant of this gloomy region is there beside Alicia?"

After a few moments' thought he exclaimed—

"Oh, fool that I am to forget! the young girl from Ostend is here, to be sure—she who would not consent to receive the fond embraces of the Prior of St. Mary's. Ah, yes, how could I forget! She is but a child, too, to utter such groans as that. Her cell is yonder, and she is left to perish, I suppose."

The confessor seemed now, as he looked in the direction of the cell he mentioned, to be consulting a little, but the result was what might have been expected, for with a toss of his head, he said, suddenly—

"Well, let her perish; Alicia engages my attention now; and, besides, there is no comparison between then, and there would be just as much trouble with one of them as with the other."

With this speech the pious man strode onwards down towards the deep gloom that lay to the left of where he had been standing and looking about him.

"You scoundrel," thought Duval, "I will follow you now for the sake of Alicia; but I am glad you have given me information that there is another victim in this place, for before I leave it I will rescue her likewise."

Never had Claude Duval felt greater satisfaction at the prospect of the good that he might do in the carrying out of any of his adventures than he did now at the idea that by coming to the convent to save Alicia he might be the means of likewise snatching another human being from the terrible fate that awaited her.

Following the confessor, now, rightly but silently, and being himself in the deep shadow of the place, while Father Garvey was plainly visible by the lamp that he carried, Claude saw him at length pause at a portion of the wall of the open space.

That open space, to which the narrow vaulted passage had led, deserves something like a description.

Imagine a space of about thirty feet in one direction and in the other of more than a hundred. The floor is partly earth, beaten very hard, and partly covered with flat red tiles. The roof is somewhere about twenty-five feet in height. In fact, this place was as nearly as possible under the floor of the chapel.

Around the walls appeared at intervals low arched gothic doors, and it was to one of these that the confessor now directed his attention, and, no doubt, there was the cell of Alicia.

The heart of Claude beat rapidly.

"Now," he thought, "I shall indeed, knowing where this fair young creature is imprisoned, have a chance of rescuing her from priestly tyranny—a chance do I say? Oh, I will take such special care that it shall be a certainty."

The confessor now rattled his key in the lock of the cell door, but it was hard to open, and he had to place his lamp upon the floor before he could manage to turn the key, since it required the strength of both his hands to do so.

Then it was evident he was very careful, lest he should defeat his own intentions, and break the key in the lock, so that it was about half a minute of suspense both to him and to Claude Duval before the harsh grating sound of the rusty wards of the lock, as they yielded to the power of the key, came upon their ears.

"Done at last," said he.

He stooped and picked up the lamp from the floor before he opened the door of the cell, and then, with his right hand he opened it wide, and holding up the lamp, he cried—

"Girl! girl! Are you here? Speak!"

"Mercy!" cried a faint voice.

"Good," said the confessor, "good," and he at once crossed the threshold of the cell.

CHAPTER CCCLIV.

FATHER GARVEY FINDS AFFAIRS ANYTHING BUT PLEASANT.

In one moment, Claude Duval was at the door of the cell into which Father Garvey had stepped, with such a feeling in his mind of perfect security from all interception.

The door had partially closed after the priest, so that it only remained open about six inches, but that was all the better for Duval, as in the darkness he could stand close to it and look into the cell, without much chance of being seen by the confessor.

And after all, now, Duval did not a great deal care whether he was seen or not, for he had accomplished the principal object of his visit to that underground region in finding out where Alicia was imprisoned, and beyond a little curiosity to know what the holy father might want to say to Alicia, he had nothing to do now but to lay hold of him, and dispose of him, not as the lady abbess had intended, but in some way that would at all events keep him out of harm's-way for a time.

The cell in almost every respect was like the other one in which Claude had been. If possible, it was a trifle smaller, and the roof was a little lower.

The lamp that the priest carried was ample light for such a small place, so that everything in it was as clearly visible as possible, so that Duval had no difficulty whatever in being a spectator of all that occurred.

Oh, how little did the terrified and agonized Alicia dream that almost within arm's length of her was such a protector as Claude Duval!

In the farther corner of the cell there was Alicia—pale as death itself, and half reposing upon some straw that was on the floor. The beautiful young creature held out both her hands as though their weak force would be sufficient to keep from her the confessor, and there was upon her face an expression of the most terrible dread.

The priest looked at her in silence for some moments, and then in a thick, husky voice, he said—

"Girl! why do you regard me with such looks?"

"Oh! have mercy!"

"Mercy! What have I done that you should doubt my mercy? Why am I here? Of course I come to save you."

"To save me?"

"Most assuredly. Do you think that I could, by any possibility, permit the abbess to murder you ? Do you think that I, a man, could feel towards you as an angry woman would ?"

"I do not understand you," said Alicia. "If your words are not a mockery —if you comprehend them in the same sense that I do, you will let me go forth from this dreadful place."

"Well, and why not?"

"Can I hope so much?"

"It is just what I came for."

"Oh, I will bless you if, indeed, you have repented of the past and will "Tell me exactly what you wish."

"Only liberty. All I wish is that you would let me leave the convent. Give me leave to feel that I am free, and I will then find some one to befriend me. Place me in any street in London that you like, and leave me to my own fortunes."

"Indeed! Perhaps you would change your religion ?"

"Religion? Is it for you to talk of religion?"

"Certainly. I am a priest—but, at the same time, I am a man. Do you think that because I am a priest I have neither eyes nor other senses ? Do you think that because I am a priest I do not see that you are beautiful, Alicia?"

"Then—then—" again she moaned—"oh, is this keeping your promise to set me free ? No—no, it is the old talk."

"Silence! girl. I will set you free unknown to the abbess—likewise to all in the convent. I came here for that very purpose. You shall find that there is one, at least, who will not let you pine in such a place as this."

Alicia only looked at him now, but she made no reply to him. She had too good reason to doubt the sincerity of his statements.

"Listen," he continued. "I intend, by the power that a full and complete knowledge of this place, and the possession of a key which will open all its several doors, give me, to take you out of the convent before day dawns."

"Can this be possible ?"

"Yes, upon conditions."

"Conditions ?—Oh, what conditions ?"

"You shall hear. They are not hard ones—on the contrary, they are such as ought to present themselves to you in the most delightful and glowing colours."

"I will listen," said Alicia, sadly.

"For some time past," said the confessor, "I have been tired of my residence in England, and I have sent letters to Rome to get myself removed to some other country. They have been answered to the effect, that if I so liked, I might take up my residence at Lisbon. You, no doubt, are well aware that that city abounds in all that can delight the senses. The climate is beautiful—the wines are charming—the women!—Hem! I don't mean that; but I mean to say that a residence in Lisbon will be a very agreeable change."

"Go, then," said Alicia; "and take my prayers with you, if you release me before your departure from this place."

"That I mean to do; for upon your release will depend my departure altogether."

"I do not understand you."

"Fair girl, I make you the offer of being the companion of my flight to Lisbon. When there, I will introduce you as my niece. Most priests have a niece; and nobody is so ill-mannered as to make any further inquiries about such a personage. Your life will glide away in tranquillity and pleasure. What say you? Is the condition a hard one ?"

"It is such a one that I cannot express my indignation at. I prefer death to such degradation."

"Indeed?"

"Oh, yes; and I now only pray that Heaven will take me to itself, and save me further suffering."

"Rash girl, you know not what you say. Beware!—oh, beware!"

"Of what? I have nothing to beware of but the wild anger of the abbess, who so transgresses the commands of that Heaven she affects to serve, as to persecute where she should protect."

"It is not of the abbess that I bid you beware."

"Of whom, then?"

"Of me. I am all-powerful! I tell you, girl, you are at my mercy."

"Your mercy? That is a quality you do not possess; so it cannot come into question."

"Very good," said the priest. "Then you consent, of course?"

"Never!"

"Pho! pho! You see, girl, that I am not at all angry at this little coquetry on your part, for it only adds a zest to beauty, as sauce does to some delicate dish. I will just tell you, though, what would be your fate if I were not to save you from it."

"I know it."

"Oh, no, you don't. Did you never hear of the well?—the convent well, I mean?"

Alicia shuddered. She had, indeed, heard of the well, for the old nuns had threatened her with death by being cast down it frequently upon finding that she was not willing to consent to what the superior desired of her.

"You need not answer me," said the priest. "I can see that you have heard of it."

"If death is to be my fate," said Alicia, clasping her hands and looking upward, "it is easier and better than the degradation to which you would consign me."

"Stop a bit; you reckon too quickly. The abbess, before you were consigned to the well, would amuse herself by submitting to you such punishments that you would wish for any death to escape from them; and, besides, I would ask you what is to hinder me from by force achieving that result which you will not from love accord to me?"

"Oh, Heaven send me succour now!"

"Heaven? Stuff! Do you fancy that the age of miracles, if there ever was one, is to be restored specially upon your account? Why, you must be mad, girl."

"Still I have a hope that, as Heaven looks down into this dreary cell, and sees the danger that I am in, something will yet happen to aid me—yes, to deliver me."

"Despair of any such circumstance; you are here wholly and entirely in my power. Your cries—your shrieks would not be heard here; or if they did faintly reach the ears of some shrinking nun, she would but cross herself, and with a prayer to the Virgin compose herself to rest again."

"Is there no humanity in this place?"

"No; but there is plenty of piety."

Alicia sobbed, and wrung her hands:

"Girl," added the confessor, "I begin to perceive that you are now awakening to the hopeless character of your position. Surely it is better to be friends than foes with me. Come, let me clasp your wondrous beauty in these arms. I want you to rain soft kisses upon my lips—I want to hear you tell me that you love me; and you shall do so. Resistance is all in vain. You may shriek—howl—pray, or rave as you please, but still you are mine, and mine only. Ha! ha! You are weak, and I am strong."

"Help!" shrieked Alicia.

"If you please, sir," said Claude Duval, as he stepped into the cell and placed his hand on the shoulder of the confessor—"if you please, sir, I beg to object to this little proceeding."

Had a thunderbolt suddenly fallen to his feet, the confessor could not possibly have been more thoroughly confounded than he was at this most unlooked-for interruption. It so staggered him, that after one cry of surprise and fear, he stood like a man turned to stone for a few moments.

The hand of Claude Duval was still upon his shoulder, and with a calm, keen look, he looked into the face of the audacious priest.

Poor Alicia, who had really thought that her last hour had come, for to outlive disgrace was a thought she could not for one moment entertain, still remained upon her knees in the corner of the cell, and with her arms uplifted to Heaven, appeared to implore that divine mercy, which alone could save her.

Alicia, no doubt, at this moment, could not conceive that the lawyer, and friend of the lady abbess, as she thought Claude Duval to be, could possibly come there as her champion. It rather appeared to her at that moment that his appearance was part of the plot against her peace.

This state of quiet into which the confessor was thrown, was not likely to last very long. It was but the calm which is too often a prelude to a storm.

CHAPTER CCCLV.

CLAUDE DUVAL VISITS HIS FRIENDS, AND ARRANGES A PLAN OF PROCEEDINGS.

If anything, as a mental faculty and exercise, is paid more attention to than another with the Catholic priesthood, it certainly is that presence of mind which, however estimable a quality it may be in some situations, may in others be denominated nothing but brazen impudence.

The holy Father Garvey had not had that essential portion of his education neglected. He was a Jesuit! That, we opine, is sufficient evidence of the fact.

But the circumstances into which the holy man of God was now thrown, were quite perilous. If the affair had been one of an ordinary character, he might have preserved his equanimity; but it will be borne in mind, that his passions were concerned in the matter at present on the tapis, so nature get the better of the force of education and culture, and with a howl of rage, Father Garvey awoke from the sort of trance that had come over him, and turned upon his assailant.

"Wretch! Villain!" he cried. "What do you here? But why do I ask?—why need I ask? This shall suffice."

As he spoke, he drew from some sheath that held it elevated, so that the handle was towards his hand, a dagger of about eight inches in length. It was, in truth, a most murderous and formidable looking weapon.

Making a strange circular movement with it round his head to give force to the blow, he aimed it at the neck of Claude Duval, with the full intention of despatching him.

It was well for Claude that he was quick of eye and agile of limb, or he might there and then have fallen beneath the steel of the murderous priest. As it was, he, with an agility and precision that few men could have compassed, caught the descending arm of the confessor by the wrist and gave it such a wrench, that, with a yell of pain, the would-be assassin dropped the dagger to the floor of the cell.

"Be careful," said Duval. "Another such attempt will cost you your life. Do you understand me?"

As he spoke, Claude took from his pocket with his disengaged hand a pistol, and quite heedless of the confusion he created among the teeth of the confessor, he dashed the barrel right into his mouth, and held it there.

"One touch," added Claude with the same imperturbable calmness with which he had spoken all along—"one touch to the trigger of this pistol, and your brains are scattered on yonder wall. How do you like the prospect?"

CLAUDE AT THE PORTER'S GATE OF BERRYMEAD PRIORY.

"M urder!"

"Oh, no, it would not amount to murder. If ever in this world there could be a justifiable homicide, this might be called such."

"Mercy!"

"Hold, Sir Priest! How dare you, who knows no touch of such a god-like quality, ask for mercy?"

The confessor was silent; but a fit of trembling now took possession of him, and he could hardly support himself upon his feet. From that moment Duval saw that even his vindictive spirit was for the time broken by abject fear, and he did not consider that there was anything further to apprehend from the confessor. Taking the barrel of the pistol from his mouth, then, Duval pointed to the opposite corner of the cell to that where Alicia still knelt, and in a voice of command, he said to the trembling confessor—

"Go there."

"Yes—yes. What do you mean? Who are you?"

"Obey me. Kneel! That will do. If you value your life, you will be still."

The confessor shrank to the corner of the cell pointed out by Duval, and knelt down. In such an attitude Claude felt that it was not very likely he could be suddenly dangerous; for unless he had fire-arms it would be quite impossible for him to make any aggressive movement unobserved.

All this scene, which we have had to describe in its details at some length, happened with great rapidity. So much so, indeed, that Alicia had scarcely time to ask herself if it could be possible that the man who had been introduced to her by the abbess as the agent of the Beachem family could really be her friend or not.

The panic of the confessor, and the whole of the scene that had taken place between him and the attorney, as she thought Claude Duval to be, was too real and natural to be a piece of acting, and she had looked upon the latter part of the affair with mute wonder.

Having, though, disposed in some sort of the priest, Claude Duval at once turned to Alicia, and said to her—

"Alicia, let me as soon as possible say sufficient to you to induce you to trust me. I am your friend—I am the friend of Mr. Field, who loves you, and my errand here is to protect and to save you."

With a cry of joy, Alicia rose, and springing forward, she, with a childish confidence that was irresistibly enchanting, flung herself into the arms of Claude Duval.

It was but for a moment, though, that the extatic feelings of the young girl at finding Heaven had indeed raised her up a friend in such an emergency got the better of her prudence and her womanly reserve. She disengaged herself from the arms of Claude Duval, and burst into tears.

Claude could very well guess the state of feeling that she had now fallen into, and with all the delicate courtesy of tone that he knew so well how to assume, he said—

"Alicia, calm your fears. You may well imagine that I am one who can be well trused by your lover, or he would not have consented to allow me to come upon this errand alone. Do not weep, I pray you. This should be the beginning of joy, not of tears."

"Oh, yes—yes, it should!" she sobbed; "but when the poor heart is full, it must find relief in tears. Save me—oh, save me from that dreadful man, and from this terrible place. Save me, and I will pray for you, and bless you while I live."

"Hush! All shall be well. But you must have a little patience, yet, Alicia, and it is necessary in the first place to get rid of this encumbrance."

As he spoke, Claude pointed to the confessor, who, thereupon, with a deep groan, fell flat upon his face, for he construed those words of Claude's into nothing less than a sentence of death against him.

"Spare him!—oh, spare even him!" said Alicia.

Claude approached close to her, and whispered in her ear, so that the priest should not hear him, saying—

"I would not soil my hands, nor afflict my soul by his murder for the world. If he remain non-resisting as he is now, he is safe enough from me at present; but it will be necessary and highly proper to secure him somewhere where he can do no mischief either by detailing what has taken place here to others, or by taking active steps himself to thwart us in our future proceedings."

"Dear friend what do you purpose doing with him?"

"Placing him in one of the cells and leaving him there for a time a prisoner. I have from his own lips heard that neither cries, nor shrieks, nor prayers, have any effect upon the inhabitants of the convent when coming from these dreary cells; so upon his own showing he will be safe enough. You have no objection to his being so located?"

"Oh, no—no. But tell me—is he quite well and happy--Mr. Field, I mean?"

It was with downcast looks that Alicia ventured to ask this question concerning her lover, and Claude Duval could easily imagine how many more she would gladly have given utterance to, but that maidenly reserve held her back from so doing.

"Well, in bodily health, doubtless he is," said Duval, "but happy he is not since you are from him."

"Oh, no—no; but—but——"

"What doubt is it that hangs upon your lips?"

"He might himself have come to my rescue."

Claude smiled as he replied—

"And so he would, but I prevented him."

"You prevented him?"

"Yes, for his own sake as well as for yours, I would not let him come, and I will tell you the reason. Love, Alicia, is a feeling that in its intensity swallows up all others. It would have been out of the question for him who loves you as Field does to come here and play the part that I have played and that I still have to play, for your rescue. His feelings would have overcome him on the instant that he saw you, and you, too, if you had suddenly been introduced to a room in which you saw him as you saw me, could you have so far restrained your feelings as to seem to know him not?"

"No—oh, no."

"So I could have sworn, Alicia. Do not, then, for one moment blame your lover for not himself coming here to manage your escape. I prevented him from so doing."

"I owe you the more thanks. You have convinced me that you have pursued the best course. But what do you propose now?"

"Stop! The confessor."

Father Garvey upon hearing himself now spoken of, uttered a deep groan, and piteously looked up. Alicia understood what Claude Duval meant, which was, that they should put him, the confessor, in some place of safety before they proceeded further in their plan of escape, or even before they spoke further of the mode by which that desirable end was to be accomplished.

"Come, holy and accomplished sir," said Claude Duval, as with his foot he stirred up the attention of Father Garvey, "I will trouble you to rise and follow me forthwith."

"Have mercy upon me! What good will it do to you to take my life? You have conquered me, I freely admit. Oh, be just and merciful to me, now! If it be your wish to leave the convent with this young lady, only say so, and I will smooth the way for you. I will take you past all the dangerous places, and see you safely in the open air. But do not—oh, do not slay me, I beg of you!"

"Follow!"

"Mercy! mercy! Oh, Alicia, bid him spare me! To you I appeal! You are gentle and good. You do not wish to see blood shed, or to know that it is shed."

He tried to take hold of her hand, but Alicia shrunk from him with horror.

"Abstain from appealing to her," said Claude Duval. "Recollect the character of your answers to her, when only a short time ago she appealed to you, and you thought that no help was nigh. I wonder that with all your priestly cunning you are foolish enough not to draw such a parallel. Follow me at once!"

"Yes, yes—oh, yes! I will follow you; but you will yet spare my life? Help! help! mercy! Oh, murder! Help! mercy!"

The confessor lost all self-control, and shrieked aloud.

CHAPTER CCCLVI.

FATHER GARVEY HAS A TASTE OF THE CONVENT CELLS, WHICH HE DOES NOT ADMIRE.

THE sound of the cries of the confessor echoed through the open space outside the cell; and notwithstanding he had himself assured Alicia that no cries, however loud, that might be uttered in that place would reach any ears in the convent, and that if they did, such sounds would be paid no attention to, Claude Duval was afraid that the racket and confusion he made while the fear of death was so strong upon him, would be fatal to the future plans of himself and Alicia.

Under these circumstances, it became necessary to let the half-mad wretch know that his life was safe.

Clutching him by the throat with a force that at once stopped his cries, by nearly stopping the whole of his breath—for Claude Duval felt quite certain that there was no other mode of quieting him—he spoke calmly and deliberately—

"I would not soil my hands nor my conscience by taking your life. That is safe; but you will, for security, occupy one of the cells for a time. Do you understand that?"

"I do," said the priest, in half-choked accents.

Claude then took his hand from his throat, and permitted the half-strangled wretch to breathe again, when, casting himself at the feet of Duval and Alicia, he cried out in abject accents—

"Oh, what clemency—oh, what tokens of mercy is this! How can I possibly thank you both sufficiently for my life—how can I say or do enough to thank you?"

"Silence—silence!"

"Nay, but I will tell you all. You cannot escape the intricacies of the convent. All the routes that lead from it are too well guarded for you to escape. There are several men employed by the Jesuit Committe who keep guard, and there are some of the old nuns who know the use of fire-arms. It will be impossible for you to leave the place except you encounter the whole convent. You will be crushed in the attempt if you had twenty lives unless you take me with you."

"No."

"Yes—oh, yes! With knives and with every kind of weapon that they can possibly use the nuns will oppose you. You will have to fight women—you will have to slay them. You cannot leave the convent without giving the alarm, for there are alarms in the shape of bells and of explosive substances, so placed that you must disturb them. Do you wish to fight your way through a mass of alarmed women—do you wish to kill them? Oh, no! But you will save yourself all this if you take me with you."

"No."

"Yes—oh, yes, let me advise you—let me implore you!"

"Not another word. Follow me. Alicia, do you take the light; I shall not feel at ease till I have this fellow under lock and key."

The confessor gathered enough from the tone in which Claude Duval spoke to feel that it was quite useless to urge him further, and so, despite his horror at being shut up in one of the cells, he had to reconcile his mind to it as best he could, and he only shook his head now and then as he followed Claude Duval and uttered deep sighs.

Duval took good care to let Alicia go first for fear the rascally priest should be seized by some sudden feeling of desperation and seek to take her life, thinking possibly that, after all, by so doing he could not be making his own situation worse than it was in reality.

In this way, then, they left the cell, and Alicia held the light as high as she could, so that Claude Duval might get a good look at the open space from which the cells opened.

"There is one," said Alicia.

"Yes," replied Duval, as he pushed open the door of the cell, "this one will do. Now, holy and pious sir, walk in."

"In—there?"

"Precisely."

"But—but—you will not——"

"Will not what?"

"Lock and bolt and bar the door, surely, if I give you my sacred word of honour, and further fix that fast and strong by oaths, that I will not stray from this cell till you say I may do so. You can trust me."

"What! trust a priest? Oh, dear, no. Walk in."

"Not yet," said the confessor, and turning sharply, he fled across the open space with great speed.

"We are lost!" cried Alicia.

"No," said Claude. "Wait where you are."

On the moment Duval dashed after the priest; but the latter would probably enough, considering the intimate knowledge he had of the locality, have got off, but that he turned his head for a moment to see where was his pursuer. That movement decided his fate, for he ran against one of the columns that held up the roof, and recoiling with the shock, he fell to the ground.

In another moment Claude Duval was upon him with a shock that nearly killed him.

"So, holy sir," said Claude, "you would escape, would you?"

"Oh—oh! Oh, mercy!"

"Rise, man, at once."

"I cannot."

"Try it. Oh, you cannot, or you will not. Well, we shall see if we cannot find some mode of helping you."

Duval looked around him, but could see no means of annoying the holy father ready at hand; so he drew from his pocket a pistol, that had attached to its barrel a spring bayonet with so very fine a point that nothing could resist it.

"Try and get up now," said Claude Duval, as with the point of the bayonet he gave the confessor rather a sharp touch or two about the region of the ribs.

The glibness with which the sharp point of the little bayonet slipped through his clothing, and some couple of inches of his flesh, had a most startling effect upon the priest, and he sprang to his feet with a speed and dexterity worthy of a tumbler.

"What the devil is that?" he said.

"Oh, nothing particular," said Claude, as he gave him another touch with the bayonet that made him cut a most extraordinary caper. "Nothing particular; but I am rejoiced to see you so much better."

Laying hold of him now firmly by the back of the neck, Claude Duval led him along till they came to the door of the cell, and then by the aid of a kick that was not to be resisted, he sent him right away to the farther extremity of it.

To close the door, lock it, and put up the heavy iron bar across it, was the work of the next half minute, and Father Garvey was at all events for some time out of the way of doing any further mischief.

Alicia, during the short race that had taken place after the runaway confessor, had remained trembling by the cell door. She felt that if the priest made his escape, that there would not only oe no hope for her, but that, in all human probability, he who had ventured to that dismal place to rescue her would not escape from it with his life. It was, therefore, a great relief to her to see the confessor brought back so quickly, and in such good custody.

When he was, however, fairly thrust into the cell and the door was fastened,

Alicia felt able to breathe freely; and looking with eyes swimming in tears in Claude's face, she said—

"The grateful feelings of a life will not be sufficient even to repay you for what you have done for me."

"Don't think of that," said Claude. "What I wish now to see to is your escape; and, in the first place, tell me if you have been long enough here, or if you have seen enough of the mysteries of this convent, to come to any opinion regarding the truth or falsehood of what, in his fright, the confessor said about the difficulty of leaving the convent?"

"Alas! it is true."

"You are sure of that?"

"Yes, I have every reason to be sure of it. The one person in all this establishment who uttered many words of sympathy to me, told me the same thing; and I fear she has suffered for it."

"Who is she?"

"A young girl, a novice, who feels that happiness is not to be obtained here; and that the vices of the conventual system, even if it were properly administered, far exceed any good that can possibly accrue from it. Alas! I tremble to think what has become of her!"

"What do you suppose has become of her?"

"She disappeared."

"Disappeared? Stop! That puts me in mind that I have an idea some one is in one of the cells close at hand to this one. It may be your young friend, for all we know."

"Oh! if it should be, what a joy it will be to me to rescue her from death and despair!"

"Come on, Alicia; we will see to this at once. This way. And now while I am here, I will not leave one of these cells unsearched; and, if I can help it, there shall be no victim of Catholicism left in this terrible abode but those who are obstinately foolish enough to stay in spite of reason."

At this moment the confessor kicked loudly upon the door of his cell; but so thick was the door, and so heavily plated with iron on both sides, secured by nuts and screws, that the blows, although, no doubt, they were given with great force, only sounded hollow and muffled.

"He thinks I am gone," said Claude. "It will be, perhaps, as well to undeceive him on that head."

Duval, in order to let the priest know that he was still there, gave the door a great kick, and then all was quiet within the cell. It was tolerably clear that the holy father had an opinion it was better not to provoke his captor too far.

"Now, Alicia," said Claude Duval, "let us commence an examination of the cells; and when that is concluded, we will consider what is best to be done in the way of escape."

The cells were easily got at; but in none of them did they find any prisoner, till they came to one from which there issued a scream, as of some person in great agony, as Claude took down the iron bar that held the door shut.

"Some one is here," said Claude.

"Oh, yes, yes! If it should be Margaret, how happy I shall be that she, too, will be rescued by you from this dreadful place."

"Is Margaret the name of the young novice who spoke kindly to you?"

"Yes; oh, yes."

Claude Duval flung the door of the cell wide open, and then a voice cried out in a tone of pain—

"Oh, spare me!—spare me, I beseech you! Only let me go forth into the world, and I will say nothing of the terrors of this house. I swear that much to you by all that I hold sacred!"

"Margaret—Margaret," cried Alicia, "it is I! Oh! come forth and let me embrace you, my dear friend, and weep that you have suffered for my sake!"

Claude Duval took the light from the hands of Alicia, who then sprang into the cell, and folded a young girl in her arms, who sobbed aloud from joy at finding that it was not the abbess or the confessor who had sought her cell.

"Oh, Alicia, Alicia," she said, "it was old Sister Bertha who listened to what I said to you, and then informed the abbess, who ordered me to be imprisoned in the cells. But how is it that you are able to come to me?"

"I owe that dear privilege to this gentleman," said Alicia, pointing to Claude Duval. "He will save us both, and rescue us from this place."

"I will try to do so," said Claude. "But time's precious. Let me ask of you both again if you think that it would be possible for us to leave the convent now at once without observation?"

"No—no," they both said.

"By force, then, could it be done?"

"Ah, no," said Alicia. "I think not. We could help you but little; and the vindictive rage of the elder nuns would make each a fury."

"Well," said Claude, "listen to me, then, both of you. By exerting a little patience, I can bring a force into the convent which will put all resistance out of the question. Can you bear with this place for a few hours longer, while I go for such aid? I have no less than three friends upon whom I can fully rely. The abbess, as yet, thinks me in her power; and all I have to do is to make to her a sufficient excuse to leave the convent, and then come back again with my friends over the wall of the garden. I think I can induce the abbess to tell me how that can be done with safety. What is your reply to this?"

It was not without some reluctance that Margaret and Alicia agreed to this arrangement of Duval's; but it did not require much reflection to convince them both that he was quite right in it, and that it was far better to suffer a little further the inconvenience of being in that dismal portion of the convent than to sacrifice possibly all chances of escape.

Besides, as Claude Duval at least found it, it was hardly possible for them to do otherwise than adopt his views.

"You have only both of you," he said, "to tell me that you prefer risking everything in an attempt now at once to leave the convent to any delay, and I will try it. I am well armed. I can provide each of you with fire-arms, and we might possibly succeed."

"No, no," said Alicia, "we will wait."

"We will wait," said Margaret, as she embraced Alicia, and hid her sweet tearful face in her bosom. "God bless you, dear friend, and prosper you. We will wait in patience."

Claude Duval felt deeply affected by the conduct of these two young girls in such cruel circumstances as they were placed. The manner in which they had such great confidence in him, a total stranger to them, would at any time, even if he had not had the precise resolution to do, have inspired him to do wonders in their defence.

"Trust to me, implicitly," he said. "I will soon return to you both, you may depend; and until I do, I recommend you to make the time you have to pass together as light as possible by such discourse as will engender hopes of happy days in store."

"We will—we will."

"Do so; and now farewell for a time. The lady abbess, if I did not soon make my appearance would, I feel convinced, seek me even in this spot."

This was an idea that so much alarmed Alicia and her young friend, the novice, that they were both as anxious for Duval to go as they had been for him to stay.

CHAPTER CCCLVII.

THE LADY ABBESS IS QUITE DELIGHTED WITH DUVAL'S CONDUCT.

Go at once," said Alicia. "We will not attempt even to thank you for what you have already done; but the time may come when, with minds more free from the shadow of present evils, we may be able to do so."

Claude, with an assuring smile to them, waived his hand; and then, with the lamp in his hand, without which he felt that he could never have found his way to the chapel again, he took his route back to that portion of the conventual edifice.

It was sorely against his feelings and inclinations to leave those two young creatures in so gloomy a region; but the more anxious he felt for their release, the more he decided that it should depend wholly upon himself.

The reasoning by which he brought himself to temporise with this adventure, and to act with a greater degree of caution and forethought towards danger than he had ever done in his life before, simply arose from the full consciousness he had that if he, unaided, were to attempt the escape of the two young girls, and if he was to be killed in that attempt, their fates would be sealed.

Such a contingency might happen if he were to make the attempt alone; but if there were several with him, the death of one would not be a death-blow to the whole party.

This was the feeling with which he now made his way back to the convent chapel, and to the lady abbess, to give her a report of his proceedings as regarded the holy father confessor.

That that amiable lady was waiting with no small amount of impatience for news of the death of the confessor, he did not for a moment doubt.

At any other time, alone as he now was, and without the dread of any interference with his life and liberty, Claude Duval would have been glad to have taken the opportunity of examining more minutely the underground place in which he was; but he felt that the very existence of the two young creatures who had placed implicit reliance upon his honour, and his exertions, were at stake, and therefore he would not, although sorely tempted so to do, tarry by the way.

"I may yet have," thought he, "another, and a still better opportunity of discovering some of the mysteries of this monastery, and if I do I will take good care to avail myself of it most thoroughly."

As he passed the mysterious looking well in the court-yard adjoining the cell, he cast down it a shuddering glance, and he thought how convenient it must be to such an establishment to have such a place in which to get rid of the remains of those who become obnoxious, either by their obstancy in clinging to their earthly possessions, or by their virtue to the authorities of the convent.

With such thoughts as these busy at his brain, Claude Duval made his way rapidly towards the flight of steps that led up to the chapel of the establishment.

Nothing happened to disturb the even tenor of his way, as he went, and he reached the little door that opened into the chapel, close to one of the confessionals without hearing a sound.

To open the door was the work of a moment, and then he was about to step into the chapel, when a hand was laid upon his arm, and a voice cried to him—

"Hush! Not a word."

It was the voice of the Lady Abbes.

Before Claude Duval could reply, a loud shriek burst upon the still air, and then as the Lady Abbess pulled him into the chapel, and without any ceremony dashed him headlong into the confessional, he saw a flash of light, and heard the confused tread of feet.

CLAUDE, DISGUISED AS A LAWYER, INTRODUCED TO THE LADY ABBESS.

It was a moment or two before Duval could make up his mind as to how much or how little, he was fully interested in what was going on; but in the course of a short time he found out pretty well what was proceeding, although the cause of it was to him a mystery.

There was a piece of gauze over one of the panels of the confessional, through which no one could see from without, because to do so was to look for light into the absolute darkness of the confessional; but nothing was easier than for Claude Duval to see through it, from the obscurity of the place in which he was into the chapel; it was quite light now from the flare of some half dozen torches.

The scene that presented itself to him was now a most wild and singular one.

Advancing from the further end of the chapel, through a doorway which connected with a passage that lead to the cells of the nuns, came about twenty of the elder sisterhood, dragging with them a young novice, whose age could not have been above nineteen. Among all that dragged her along, Claude Duval could see none of the younger sisterhood of the convent,

The Lady Abbess stood upon the steps of the altar, and kept calling out in perfectly demoniac accents,—

"To the cells with her! To the cells with her! She is possessed by a fiend! Drag her along! To the cells! She shall never see the light of day again!"

The young girl shrieked aloud, and then some of the old nuns about her dealt her several blows upon the face with their fists, and others tore her cheeks with their nails.

They seemed delighted, did those old hags, who no doubt had been compelled from their vices to retire from a world that would no longer tolerate them, to have it in their power to inflict injury upon that young and helpless creature.

Without being so fair and engaging in her beauty as Alicia, this young girl was still of very prepossessing appearances, and delicate form. It was quite out of the question for her to do any good by attempting to defend herself against the host of foes that surrounded her.

And yet with the feeling of desperation which, no doubt, the knowledge of the fate to which she was about to be to consigned engendered in her mind, she struggled to the extent of her ability against the old nuns, and several of them were hurt in the great squabble.

"Drag her along!" screamed the abbess. "Oh, fools that you are! will one girl, a mere child, get the better of you all?"

Upon this the old hags surrounded her like furies, and in a few moments there was hardly a rag of clothing left upon the novice.

"Mercy!—Oh, mercy!" she cried.

"That will do," said the abbess. "Place her in one of the cells, and we will see how she looks and thinks at this time to-morrow night. We will give her twenty-fours for reflection. Ha! ha!"

"Help!—Oh, help!" screamed the girl.

"Ha! ha!" laughed the Lady Abbess. "You would hardly believe it, my dear sisters, but this child came to me and demanded to be let out of the convent, and to go to her friends; because she said she had been hidden in the chapel, and had seen me in here with a man, and had heard me say strange things to him."

"Oh, mother!" cried all the old nuns.

"She is mad!" said one. "Mad!"

"Yes, dear sister Margaret, she is mad," said the Lady Abbess; "but if she got out into the world, the are people—enemies, I mean, of our holy faith—who would pretend to believe her, particularly wretches connected with newspapers, so drag her along."

"Oh, Heaven!" cried the young girl; "is there no hope? Is there, indeed, no hope for me in this world."

"None," said the abbess.

Oh, how gladly would Claude Duval, if he could have but for one moment thought it prudent to do so with reference to the safety of others as well as that of the young girl herself, have rushed out of the confessional and told her that he would protect her; but the idea of having, single handed, to fight the whole convent was too much of a good thing, and he kept quiet from the conviction that he would be able soon to rescue this young novice as well as Alicia and her young friend.

The abbess herself descended from the elevated station she had taken on the altar steps, and opened the door leading to the vaults.

"Away with her," she cried, "away with her!"

The nuns dragged the girl along, but what with the ill-usuage she had received and the exhaustion consequent upon her struggle, she fainted, so they had to carry her through the doorway, which they did with as little care of whether they hurt or not as if she had been a bundle of hay.

As the young creature was carried through the door-way the abbess struck her several blows with her clenched hand, and stamped with rage at the idea that she had been retorted to by one so young and so bold.

Gradually the old nuns, with the girl in their charge, disappeared down the staircase, and then all was still, and the abbess after one hasty glance around her opened the door of the confessional and said, in a low tone of voice—

"Mr. White—Mr. White?"

"Yes," said Claude, "I am here."

"Come out then and leave the chapel, you know the way?"

"Where to?"

"To my room."

"Oh, yes, I think I do, my charming madam."

"Stop."

"At your pleasure. What would you say?"

"I cannot control my impatience to know if Father Garvey is at all likely to trouble us more?"

"Not at all. You may take my word for it, madam, that you need be under no uneasiness at all regarding the pious father."

"What? You then accomplished your purpose in the vaults?"

"I did."

"You are a man after my own heart—go at once to my room, I beg of you. The night is still young, and I will come to you soon. I do not want the old nuns to see you here. Oh, what a narrow escape I have had."

"As how?"

"That abominable novice, she actually saw you here, and heard all that passed, and if it had not been for her own simplicity she might at some inopportune moment have escaped, and so brought, by her tales, ruin upon us all."

"What a pity!"

"A pity! It would have been destruction worse than death itself to me. But fortune has favoured us, Mr. White, and all is well. You shall tell me all that passed."

"Nay, you know that best."

"You misunderstand me. I allude to Garvey's visit to the cells. Oh, the villain! How well I knew that he would make such a visit. But go to my room now at once and wait for me there. You will find the way; I must stay here till the sisters come up from the vaults again. Go at once, for I hear them."

Duval felt that it was anything but politic to remain longer in the chapel, for of all things that he had now to dread, so far as the safety of the persons in the vaults was concerned, was that the abbess should have any suspicions concerning his intentions.

"I go," he said, "and await you with impatience."

"You will not have to wait long."

Claude Duval glided past the altar, and, without much difficulty, he found the door in the wall which led by the secret and circuitous passage to the lady abbess's room.

The determination of Claude Duval was now made to leave the convent as quickly as possible, and seek his friends, informing them of the state of affairs there, and getting them to make such arrangements with him as should enable him and them to make a vigorous systematic attempt to rescue the unfortunates who were in the vaults.

That there were three now to rescue from that horrible state of imprisonment Claude Duval knew, and that there might be yet more to be found was a likely enough proposition, reasoning upon the facts that he already knew.

With such thoughts he hurried to the abbess's room.

CHAPTER CCCLVII.

CLAUDE DUVAL LEAVES THE CONVENT AND REPORTS PROGRESS TO HIS FRIENDS.

It was not very likely that in the state of mind he was now in Claude Duval would pay much attention to the little disagreeables of the narrow passage in which he found himself after leaving the chapel by the secret door at the back of the altar; but he found himself in the course of a few moments amid such a cloud of dust, and so completely enveloped in spiders' webs, that he paused in surprise.

"Surely," he thought, "the lady abbess comes much too often along this passage for it to be in this condition."

The further he advanced the more untrodden and strange did the place appear, until at length he found his course arrested by a door, such as he was quite certain he had not seen before.

This at once led Claude Duval to the conclusion that he had taken some wrong turning, and had wandered away from the route that would lead him direct to the room of the abbess.

Such a state of things under existing circumstances was not exactly what he could have wished, although as regarded the grand notion of making what discoveries he could in the convent it might be all very well.

"I must retrace my steps," said Duval, "for this will never do. If anything more than another will arouse the suspicions of the abbess, it will be not finding me in her room when she herself repairs to it."

It was not difficult at all to get into the right track again. Claude Duval found that he had, without thinking of it, taken a turn to the left instead of going straight on, and so found his way into that unused portion of the secret passage that terminated at the door which had aroused him to a sense of his error, and barred his further progress.

The other portion of the passage was clear enough from any of the encumbrances in the shape of dust and spiders' webs with which the unused portion was so filled up, and in the course of a few moments more Claude Duval was in the abbess's room.

It is frequently from some trifling mistake, though, that we elaborate a new idea, and so now was it in this instance with Claude Duval. He thought it highly probable that the door he had come to, and which had stopped his course in the direction he had inadvertently taken, might possibly, if it were opened, disclose some other of the secrets of the convent.

"I will not forget that there is such a door," he said, "and I can reserve the knowledge of it for future consideration."

Being now alone in the abbess's room, Claude Duval had an opportunity of looking about him, which, had she been there, he could hardly have availed himself of with such facility.

He was quite surprised when he came to look closely at the furniture and fittings of the apartment to see the amount of wealth and luxury that it really contained within its not very large dimensions.

The chairs were inlaid with plates of gold, silver, and pearl, and the hangings were all of the most rich and costly description. Upon a beaufet in one corner there were cups and tankards of gold and silver, and upon every table and shelf in the room there was quite a crowd of little objects of art and taste, all of the most costly character.

"These are the spoils of monasteries," said Claude Duval to himself. "I wonder whether it would be safe now to lay hands on a few of these relics of the past?"

There was one square box of solid gold that struck the eye of Claude Duval.

In the centre of the lid of it there shone a ruby of great size and beauty, and an inscription upon the side of the box was as follows—

"HERE ENSHRINED IS A NAIL OF THE TOE OF THE HOLY ST. ANTHONY."

"Confound his toe," said Claude Duval. "I should like the box very much. Ah! I hear a footstep."

The panel in the wall opened, and with a flushed countenance the abbess made her appearance in the room.

"Oh, you are here?" she said.

"Certainly," replied Claude. "The way was short and easy. You expected me here, did you not?"

"To be sure I did. I am fatigued."

"Pray be seated," said Claude Duval, as he very politely handed her a chair.

"Thank you. My malediction light upon that wretch!"

"What wretch, may I ask?"

"Oh, you saw her. The novice I allude to, who is now safe in the vaults. Ha! ha! She will not be very likely to see daylight again."

"Serve her right, too."

"You really think so, Mr. White?"

"Of course I do. The girl is a fool."

"Ah, she is—she is. Why, Mr. White, I do, indeed, begin to think that you are a person after my own heart."

"I am sorry for that."

"Sorry—sorry?"

"Yes, that you only begin to think so. I really had hopes that you had settled that in your mind to your complete satisfaction a long time ago."

"Well—well, perhaps I have; but what made you call the novice a fool?"

"Just because I think everybody is a fool who sees the way to any enjoyment, and don't at once take advantage of it. She saw that if she had chosen she might have led a placid enough life here; but with her stupid prejudice, which, forsooth, she will call virtue, she would not do so; and behold what is the result."

"True—true," cried the abbess, clapping her hands together. "You are a dear man, Mr. White."

Claude Duval bowed in reply to the compliment. Of course he had said what he had for the express purpose of making the abbess thoroughly and entirely trust him, so that he might with a greater certainly succeed in defeating her in her abominable cruelties and deceptions.

"Go to that beaufet," she said. "You will see a long-necked bottle there with some yellow wax round the cork."

"With all the pleasure in the world."

"It is some of the finest wine in the world even now. You will find glasses there. I feel that I want something to refresh me."

"No doubt of it," said Duval, as he coolly knocked the top of the neck of the bottle off against the edge of the table, and then poured out a glass of rich sparkling Burgundy for the lady abbess, and a glass for himself—"I have no doubt you are fatigued."

"I am, indeed."

She drank the wine at a draught; and as Claude Duval felt quite sure that no trick in the way of drugging was played with that bottle, at all events, he followed her example.

The wine was truly delicious.

"This wine," he said, "merits all the encomiums you can possibly pass upon it, madam."

"No doubt of that. I expect that it is exceedingly fine. But now tell me how you sped with Father Garvey. Keep nothing from me. I would like to hear all that passed."

"I can have no motive in concealing anything from you. You shall hear all, and I think you will then admit that no one can possibly have more disposition than I have to do you all the service you can require of me."

"Go on—go on."

"You gave me a poniard, and you told me to follow him. I did so follow him, and as I went I had twenty opportunities if I had chosen to embrace them of compassing the rascal's destruction."

"Why did you not—oh, why did you not?"

"I thought it more consistent with your wishes and your intentions that I should follow him and see what he was about. I knew that at any time I could at once spring upon him and do the deed."

"Ah, true; that was quite right. I had forgotten. My head is rather in a whirl to-night. Go on."

"I followed him, then, to the gloomy passage at the foot of the secret stairs, and then he traversed a rather large open space."

"Yes—yes; I know it well,"

The abbess shuddered as she spoke, and Claude Duval continued—

"He reached the cells or dungeons, call them what you will, and opening one of them he began a threatening discourse with Alicia."

"Ah, as I suspected. The villain!"

"I listened for a little time, just sufficient to hear from him the most atrocious calumnies against you, and the vilest proposals to the young girl; and then at the moment that he was threatening her with force I interfered."

"You killed him!" cried the abbess, springing to her feet; "tell me that you killed him!"

"Why he would not be quiet, and, under such circumstances, I can safely say that he lies in one of the cells now, and will trouble you no more."

"'Tis well: I breathe freely now."

She resumed her seat again, and then, after a few moments' silence, she said, suddenly—

"Did you speak to Alicia?"

"I did."

"Ah! and what did you say to her?"

"Bearing in mind the object of my visit here, and the duty that I owe to the Beachem family, I thought it was a good opportunity of asking her to sign the deed that will divide her fortune equally between the church and her dear relations."

"Well, so it was. What said she?"

"I think from what she said, and from the fright she experienced by the threats of Father Garvey, that we shall succeed with her; and the sooner we place the documents before her the better."

"This very hour! Do it now!"

"There is only one little objection."

"Objection! What objection—what possible objection can there be?"

"Just this, that I have not the deed with me. Do not look surprised. It is not far off; I left it, I find, in my travelling vallise at the inn at Ealing where I put up before coming on here to the convent. My own feeling is that the best thing I can possibly do is to go now at once and get that important document, and lay it before Alicia to sign, while fright at Father Garvey and gratitude to me occupy her mind."

"This is very provoking," said the abbess.

"It is so."

She played with her fingers up on the table, and looked at Claude Duval for a few moments in silence, and then she said—

"Well, well, it cannot be helped, now; go you must for this deed. The Beachems are too good friends to us for us to neglect their interests. I think with you that the sooner the girl is made, by fair means or by foul, to sign the deed, the better."

"Decidedly so."

"And then, Mr. White, I do hope that you and I will understand each other, and that your visits here will be as frequent as your wishes may dictate."

"I should stay here altogether, then," said Claude, "if that were to be the case."

"Ah, flatterer!"

"No, indeed, I do not flatter. But I may truly say that the man who can really tell himself that he has awakened an interest in the breast of such a person as yourself, with such a world of attractions, may well feel flattered."

"Are you sincere?"

"Oh, on my honour!"

"Well, then, go and get the deed, and then—oh! come back to me as soon as you can, for the time will feel very long till I see you again. Now that I have got rid of that detestable Father Garvey, you do not know how truly I feel for you."

"Yes," thought Claude, "you have, as you think, got him murdered, and you are willing that I should step into his situation. I quite understand you, my lady."

CHAPTER CCCLVIII.

THE LADY ABBESS IS COMPLETELY DECEIVED BY CLAUDE DUVAL.

UNDER no other circumstances than those now present would the lady abbess of the convent have been taken in by Claude Duval; but it is no uncommon phenomenon in human nature for the passions completely to blind the judgment for a time.

The fact is, she was, we were going to say, in love with Claude Duval, only that we feel it would be a desecration of the word, love, to apply it to the coarse and despicable vices of the abbess.

No doubt, however, can exist but that it was the existence of the strong feeling of partiality for Claude Duval that had the effect of making her the easy victim of the deceit that was being practised by him.

Although she had given him leave to go to Ealing and get the deed, yet she did not seem to like him to go out of her sight; and, with quite a die-away sort of look, she said—

"You will soon be back?—you will really soon be back, now?"

"Certainly I will. Of course."

"Ah, you are a dear man!"

"Thank you. I will go at once; because, you see, the sooner I do so the sooner I shall be back."

"Yes, of course—of course. I assure you that all the advantages that the late Father Garvey possessed you shall possess."

"That is very delightful to think of," said Duval.

"Ah, yes, you would say so if you knew all."

"All? Do I not know all?"

"I don't think you do. Father Garvey was not a priest."

"Indeed?"

"No. But he was a friend of mine, and you may be that friend, too, if you like."

"If I like? Ah, can you doubt it?"

"Very well; then, you will understand that when all this affair of the Beachems with the girl, Alicia, is settled, and you come here regularly three or four times a week, which I hope you will, I shall introduce you as the confessor of the novices and the young boarders."

"Oh!"

"You understand me, don't you?"

"Hang me if I do," said Claude Duval.

"Oh, how dull you are! As their confessor, you know, you will have so many nice little opportunities of gathering accounts from your situation; and in the way in which you can impose penances, and so on, you can, if you are so minded, rather enjoy the situation and the power you will possess—eh? Do you understand me now?"

"Well, I think I do."

"You think you do? Bah! you know you do. Well—well, we will talk of all that another time; but if you like, you can have good sport in a convent. Father Garvey had."

"Lucky dog!"

"Poh!—poh! Now go and get the document which you ought to have had with you, and be back again as quickly as you can. Stop! I have a thought."

"What is it?"

"Why, I will put you in the way of reaching this room without the necessity of ringing at the outer gate of it, leaving word with the portress, and any one that you may meet, that you are here."

"That will be a great advantage," said Claude; "and I assure you, that such a mode of reaching the convent will have the effect of increasing the number of my visits threefold."

"Will it, indeed? Then I am glad I thought of it. Follow me, now, and I will show you the way. It is a route that has not been used for some time now; for although Father Garvey knew it, he took a superstitious fear of it, and of late—I mean for the last year or so—he always came by the regular porter's gate. You, I don't think, are the sort of man to be afraid of a ghost, are you?"

"Certainly not."

"Follow me, then. This way."

The abbess led the way, carrying a lamp in her hand, into the same passage that led to the chapel; but instead of going there, she turned off into the very same portion of the passage into which Claude Duval so recently had turned by mistake.

Upon reaching the iron door which had stopped his further progress, she said—

"Your key which I gave you will open this door. Have you it about you?"

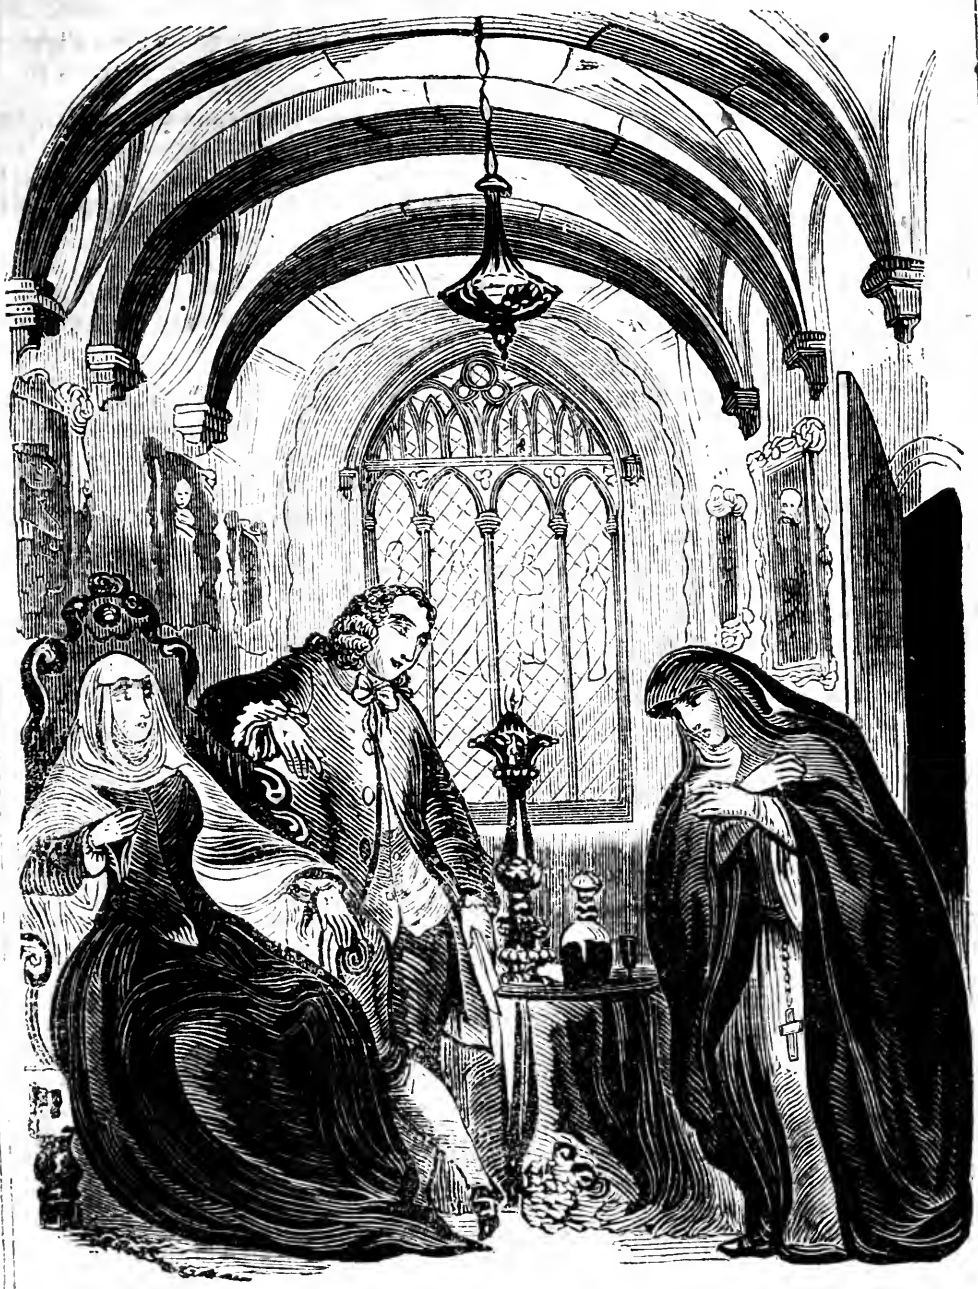
"Certainly. I would not part with it on any account."

"Try it, then."

The lock of the iron door from disuse was rather rusty and difficult to turn; but in a few minutes Claude Duval succeeded in opening it, and the door creaked upon its hinges as he opened it. All seemed involved in impenetrable darkness beyond it.

"There is a staircase," said the lady abbess. "Follow me, and mind how you go."

She preceded Claude Duval, and he counted that they descended no less a number than thirty stairs, and then they came to another door very similar to the one which was at the head of the steps.



Claude Duval opened this door likewise with his master-key, and then a sudden rush of cold air blew out the lamp.

The darkness was most excessive at that moment; but the abbess said in a low tone of voice—

"Wait a little. This darkness is the gloom of contrast. When we get a little round to it you will see pretty well enough about you. I ought to have left the lamp in the passage."

"Where are we?" said Claude.

"In the convent garden now. You will have to go along one of the gloomiest walks of it, and it will lead you to a portion of the wall, over which you will be able to get with ease, and it will conduct you to a lane. By turning to your right there you will reach the high road again with ease."

"This, then, will be my route?" said Claude.

"Yes; but let me impress upon you the necessity of not straying from it upon any account, for if you do, you will be destroyed!"

"Destroyed! How?"

"There are pitfalls, and there are traps and spring guns; so that certain death would be the result of any one unacquainted with the route attempting to get to the convent in this way."

"I will be careful."

"And they do say," added the abbess, with a shudder, and with a slight change of tone—"they do say—but that is all a delusion—that at times an apparition has been seen in this gloomy portion of the premises."

"You may depend," said Claude, "that it was the guilty and the cowardly fancy of Father Garvey that occasioned such an appearance."

"It may be so."

"At all events, I am not afraid of it; for I swear to you that if a legion of ghosts were to take up their stations here, nothing of the sort should prevent me from returning to the convent as quickly as I could with what I go now to seek."

"Hush! speak lower. I wonder how I shall find my way back in the dark? It is very provoking to have let the light go out."

"I can relieve you from that difficulty," said Claude Duval. "I have the means of relighting it about me."

"Ah, have you so?"

"Yes, some phosphorus matches, which I luckily have, will put that difficulty at rest. Where is the lamp?"

"Here—here."

Claude Duval lit the lamp for the abbess, who took care to place it on one of the stairs out of the draught of the open door.

"I thank you for this accommodation," said the abbess. "I own that I have no liking to traverse any of the gloomy passages of the convent in the dark. You are better provided than I expected."

"It is a great satisfaction to me," said Duval, "that I am able to be useful to so very charming a person."

"Go to—you don't mean what you say, I'm sure!"

"Indeed, but I do. Let me, however, go as soon as possible for the deed that I want, if it be only for the one reason that I shall the sooner be back again."

"Go, then—go."

"Will you not show me the way?"

The abbess hesitated a moment, probably from the distaste she had to come back again alone through the dismal garden walk in the dark, but it was only for a moment, and then she said in a firm voice—

"Yes, I will see you safe to the garden-wall. Come on with me. This is the way we must take. Do not deviate to the right or to the left more than you can possibly help, for there is danger in so doing."

Claude Duval did not implicitly believe all that the abbess said about the pit-falls, and the steel-traps, and the spring-guns in the convent garden. As regarded the guns, they would require the charge to be too often removed in consequence of the damp that would get to the powder to make it at all probable that they were used in such a place, so he looked upon the whole as a fable, though he did not say so to the abbess.

The soft rain that had so recently fallen had made the vegetation in the convent garden smell exceedingly fresh and pleasant, but the path upon which they were was so completely covered in, that it would have taken a rain of many hours' duration before it could have found its way to it.

On one side of this path there was a row of cypress-trees, planted very closely to each other, and of great height. On the other side there were elms, together with some very fine specimens of the mountain ash, and the branches of both species of trees had been artificially bent over towards the cypresses, so as to form quite a canopy overhead.

It was beneath this all but impenetrable shade, then, that Claude Duval slowly paced with the wicked and unscrupulous abbess of the convent.

The abbess had been right in saying that the intensity of the darkness was owing to the sudden contrast from the extinguishing of the light, for every moment enabled them to see better about them, and by the time they reached the convent-wall there was no longer any difficulty in distinguishing large objects, at all events, one from the other.

"This is the spot," said the abbess. "You will find that there are branches removed in some places and protruding in others on this side of the wall, which will enable you to reach the top, and when you get there, you will creep along till you come to the trunk of a chestnut-tree. Do you attend?"

"Yes. The trunk of a chestnut-tree."

"Exactly. When you get to that spot you will find that there is the same mode of descending the wall to the lane."

"Which way do I take the route to the chestnut-tree? Right or left?"

"To your left. I was rather confused, or I should have told you that. Now, go on as quickly as you can, and believe me I shall expect you with impatience."

"Not more so than I shall look forward to my return."

"How long do you really think you shall be now?"

Claude Duval thought there would be no great difficulty in getting back with his friends in an hour from that time, but he did not by any means wish the lady abbess to be upon the look-out for him, so he said after a little consideration—

"I do not think it possible for me to be upon this spot again in less than two hours and a half from now."

"That is a long, long time."

"It is, but I cannot help it. May I hope that you will sit up till my return?"

"I shall certainly do so. What is the time now?"

Even as the abbess spoke, the church clock at Ealing struck the hour of one. Claude Duval had thought it later, and he was agreeably surprised to find that it was not so. The fact is, we are accustomed to think of time with reference to incidents that take place in it, rather than to its actual progress; but the events which have taken us some time to detail as taking place in the convent, had in reality proceeded with great quickness.

"It is but one, you hear," said Claude Duval, as he approached the wall, and began its ascent; "you may expect me before four at the latest."

"I will be here at this spot," said the abbess, "at three, and I will wait for you from that hour; so you, knowing that, will be quicker if you can."

"I will. Farewell for the present."

Claude Duval obeyed the directions of the abbess, and in a few moments he was quite safe in the lane that ran along the side wall of the garden of the convent.

CHAPTER CCCLIX.

DUVAL AND HIS FRIENDS MAKE THEIR WAY TO THE CELLS OF THE CONVENT.

THE fact which the abbess had taken care to announce, that from the hour of three she meant to be upon the spot where she and Duval had parted, waiting for him, had in one sense all the effect she intended it to have, namely, in inducing him to make greater speed.

She did not think, though, that that speed would be for the purpose of getting back again a full hour before the time mentioned.

After a glance around him, to be certain that he was going in the right direction, Duval set off at a swinging kind of trot. He knew that, in the long run, he should get over the ground that lay between him and his friends much easier at some such pace as that than as if he had made a violent rush at once, and so lost breath and strength in the effort.

Nothing occurred to interrupt Claude Duval in the least, and he reached the outskirts of the cluster of trees where he had left his little party in perfect safety. Just as he did so, a voice called out—

"Who goes there?"

It was the voice of Jack, and Claude immediately replied to it—

"Hilloa, Jack, is that you?"

"Ah, it is Claude!" said Jack. "A thousand times welcome back again, and in safety too."

"Yes, Jack, all's right. Where are the others?"

"Close at hand."

"That will do. Lead me to them. There is no time to lose, I can assure you now."

"This way, then," said Jack. "I was keeping watch here, that was all."

"For anything special, Jack?"

"Why, I hardly know what to say to that, Claude. The fact is, that servant of Mr. Field's has been here, and had a quarrel with his master, who sent him off, and I don't like the fellow."

"Dennis, you mean?"

"Yes. That is his name. He don't seem at all to like what he suspects is going on."

"Confound his impudence! Upon what ground does he presume to dislike it?"

"That I cannot tell you; but I meant, if he tried to interfere with us any further, to give him a hint that he would get into danger by so doing, if he did not mind what he was about."

"And so he will too. In good truth, I would not advise him to be too troublesome."

Young Mr. Field and Dick Turpin were close at hand, and Claude Duval was very soon with them. He rapidly related all that had passed at the convent, and then added—

"You see from this there is no time to lose."

"You saw my Alicia?" cried Mr. Field. "Oh, tell me, did she look ill? Was she dying?"

"Dying? Nonsense! What put that into your head, Mr. Field?"

"I thought—that is, I am afraid—that—that—"

"Come, come, you must have no fears. I assure you that all will be well, if you will come with us."

"Take me where you will, so that it lead to Alicia, and I am with you, even if death were certain to be my doom afterwards."

"There will be no occasion, my good friend, for any such sacrifice, I assure you," said Claude Duval. "I have every reason to believe what I sincerely hope will come to pass, and that is, that you will soon see your Alicia quite free."

"Oh, joyous thought!"

"Well, it is so. But now listen to me, all of you, and don't say one word till I have finished my story."

They listened with silent attention to what Claude Duval said now, as though their very lives had depended upon every word that fell from his lips, and then, with the feeling strongly upon his mind that there was really not a minute of time to throw away, Claude Duval, with wonderful perspicuity and strictness, related the heads of all that had happened at the convent.

At its conclusion young Mr. Field made a spring forward, and clasped Claude Duval in his arms, exclaiming—

"My friend, my brother! oh, how can I ever hope to repay a hundredth part of the deep obligations that I owe to you!"

"Don't think of it," said Claude; "it is not worth thinking of in that way."

"You are too good—too generous!"

"No at all, Believe me, that it is a great pleasure to me to rescue Alicia and he other victims of priestly and conventual tyranny and oppression from the dreadful state in which they are in the convent; so now, without any more ado about it, let me beg of you all that you will follow me."

"We will—we will."

"Hush!" said Jack. "Ah, I have you."

Jack made a dash among the trees, and there was a howl as of some one in great distress and trouble, and Jack called out—

"No, you rascal, you don't get away from me quite so easy, I assure you. Come on—come on, or must I provide you with a pistol bullet in your head?"

"Oh, good jontilmen," said a voice, "have mercy upon me, I'm as innocent as a babby that's never to be born."

"Why, it's Dennis again," said Mr. Field.

"Confound him!" cried Turpin, "what the devil shall we do with that fellow? He positively haunts us."

"And for no good, I expect," said Claude Duval.

"Here he is," said Jack, as he dragged Dennis forward, "here is the rascal who, I suspect, has been playing the spy upon us all along. Now, Mr. Field, I have but one piece of advice to offer you regarding this man."

"What is it?"

"To hang him out of hand at once. I feel quite certain if you don't something serious will happen all through his pig-headed stupidity and his treachery. Hang him, say I, and then he will be off your mind."

"I don't know what to do with him, but I'm afraid hanging him would not have the effect of taking him off my mind."

"I'm afraid not," said Claude.

"Oh, master," whined Dennis, "it's yourself that knows I'm the faithful Dennis, any way, and my ancestors were kings of old Ireland, bedad an' sure they were, and it's meself that would scorn the dirty action."

"I don't see that, Dennis, when you have not scorned to disobey my orders and to turn spy."

"Is it disobey your orders that I did?"

"Surely so. Did not I tell you to go to the Lion Hotel at Charing Cross and there to wait for me?"

"The Lion was it, sir?"

"You know well that it was, you rascal."

"Faith, sir, then wasn't I going to that same Lion when this pretty-looking gentlemen came at me like a tiger and stopped me?"

"But you were hiding and listening."

"Is it listening you say, sir?"

"To be sure I do, and you know you are guilty."

"Is it guilty you say, sir?"

"This is insolence," said Claude Duval, impatiently; "I cannot and will not waste time upon this fellow. I have quite made up my mind that in the affair we have in hand he cannot be connected. The only thing we can do with him short of taking his life is to tie him up here until we come back."

"Oh, sir, and sure you wouldn't think of tying up the faithful Dennis? It's myself that will go with the master, and fight like a bravo!"

"Fight the priest, do you mean, Dennis?" said Turpin.

"Is it the praste you say, sir?"

"I do."

"Glory be to the saints and the pras te! I shouldn't like to fight the praste. It isn't the praste that can do anything wrong. If I said or did anything against the praste, bedad he'd may be put the curse upon me, and then what would I do?"

"Just so," said Claude Duval. "Secure this fellow, Jack, as effectually as you can. I must be off. I am getting mad at the delay."

Dennis raised a howl as Jack tied him to a tree in such a manner, that escape, unless some one came to his aid, was out of the question, and then saluting him with three or four hard slashes across the back with a riding whip, Jack said—

"Now, Dennis, if you wish to preserve yourself in a whole skin you will be quiet, and wait here till we come back, for so sure as I am a living man, if you make any disturbance I will hunt you out and shoot you."

"On, on," cried Claude Duval. "Follow me."

They all darted from the wood now, and left Dennis to himself, who after making all the efforts he could to free himself, and finding that by so doing he only made the rope with which Jack had bound him sink deeper into his flesh, he set to blubbering like a great school boy.

"Oh, dear, if I could only get away; but I can't. It's the blessed praste that they may do a mischief too. What if he did go to the young lady, and wish to be kind to her? He was the praste! What if he does take just the drop too much of wine? He is the praste! What if he does put them as won't do just what he wants 'em into a cell, and keeps 'em on bread and water, and now and then drops one or two of them into a well—isn't he the praste? The Lord be good to him! Sure, judgment will come upon them if they meddle with the praste!"

Such was Dennis's idea of the power and the influence of the priesthood of his creed; and we doubt not but that even now, when knowledge and civilization have made such rapid strides among all other classes of the community, the besotted ignorance and degraded subserviency of the lower order of Irish to their priests remains much the same as it did in the time of Gentleman Jack.

We do not mean to say but that there are good priests. We know that there are men in that capacity who are a credit to human nature, and the blessing of all around them; but they are the exceptions unfortunately; and as in the case of absolute monarchy, which is the very best form of government under the sun provided you can get a good and exalted despot, so is it the most hazardous, on account of the rarity of such characters.

For good or for evil, the catholic priesthood wield an awful power. Pity it is that the evil seems so largely to predominate, that the lesson taught to human nature by it is, to trust no human being with any such authority lest it be cruelly abused.

The reader will pardon us for this little digression, as the subject seemed in an imperative manner to call for it; and we now resume our narrative in its regular course.

Having so recently threaded the road from the convent wall to the little wood in which he had left his friends, Claude Duval was well qualified to take them back to the convent again by the most favourable route.

His impatience to get back again had all its effect upon those who were with him, and it was astonishing in how short a space of time they got back to the lane, from one side of which rose the wall of the convent.

They were rather better pleased with the soft rain that now fell, and with the dense clouds that obscured the sky, than as if the night had been one of clearness and of beauty, for the dingy aspect of everything had the effect of completely enshrouding them in obscurity.

"There is the wall," said Claude Duval, "and I think we are close to the spot at which it will be quite safe to scale it."

Duval led the way, and with that strength and agility for which he was so remarkable, and which upon more than one occasion had surprised his foes, and had the effect of saving his life, he sprang up to the low-hanging branch of a tree, and catching it, he in another moment stood upon the convent wall.

"Bravo!" said Turpin.

"Hush! hush! I can now help you all up. You come, Mr. Field, if you please."

Young Field did not want for strength or agility; but still, without the aid of Claude Duval, he might have found it rather a troublesome job to get to the top of that rather high wall.

In the course of a few moments they had all reached the wall's top, which was sufficiently wide to let any one stand upon it with ease. Claude found the part where the abbess had shown him that a descent might be made, and a minute more saw the party in the garden.

CHAPTER CCCLX.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS REACH THE CONVENT IN SAFETY.

"So far all is right," whispered Claude. "Now, don't move either of you hand or foot, till I reconnoitre the way a little."

Bearing in mind what Duval had told them the abbess had said of the means taken to prevent intruders from making their way through the garden, they did not think this excessive caution of Duval's to be at all necessary, but rather regarded it as quite proper; so there they stood like statues, while he crept cautiously on.

Of course, Claude's object was to get into the same path that he had traversed with the abbess, for he did not wish to lose time in the garden, as the secret passage that led to the chapel was what he wanted to reach.

"All is right," he said. "We are in the path. Come on."

"D—n it, what's this?" said Dick.

"Hush! not so loud, Dick. What is the matter?"

"Something is round my leg."

"Be quiet, then."

Claude Duval lit a match, and stooped down, shielding it as well as he could from the rain, and then he saw that a piece of copper wire was twisted round Turpin's foot; but it was easily removed.

"You may depend," said Turpin, "that this belongs to part of the abbess's man-traps, and, thank the fates, the apparatus must be out of order, or I might have suffered."

"You kept the path, Dick?"

"I can't say I did. An infernal great frog or toad, as large as a dinner-plate, crossed my feet, and I naturally set my right foot on to the grass edging of this flower-bed, and that did it, I suppose."

"No doubt of it. Come on, and be more cautious, I beg of you, Dick, and never mind the frogs or the toads. The rain has brought them out, no doubt, in the old garden."

"So it seems."

They now went on for some short distance, and Claude Duval was congratulating himself that all would be well, when a voice said suddenly—

"Hush—hush!"

Claude stopped, and so did the party behind him.

"Is it you, Joseph?" said the voice.

"Yes," said Claude.

"Dear me, what a cold you have got."

"I rather have."

"Well, Joseph, you can't come into the buttery to-night, although it has some splendid pie and cold game in it. The fact is, that the abbess is up still, and seems as restless as the very devil, she does."

"Oh," said Claude.

"So you must go, Joe; but mind you come to-morrow night. Don't stop now, I beg of you, for I don't know what the abbess is about. She seems half out of her wits to-night. Good-bye."

"Good-bye," said Claude.

"Well, you have got a cold!" said the voice.

They heard a light footstep make its way rapidly in the direction of the convent, and when it was safe to speak, Claude said—

"So, it seems that others of the holy sisterhood, besides the lady abbess, have their little indulgences."

"Of course," said Turpin, "nobody ever doubted that fact in connection with convents. We may thank the rain, and the wind, and the darkness of this night, Claude, for your being mistaken for Joe somebody."

"Yes, combined with that sort of feeling of security which is the product of long impunity. I have no doubt but that the lady who spoke to me never dreamt of the possibility of it being any one but her Joe."

How cold, and sloppy, and dreary, the convent garden now was. The rain dropped from leaf to leaf until it reached the lowest stratum of them, and then with melancholy splashes sought the soddened ground.

Now and then, a bird, disturbed from its roost in some old tree by the wet, would fly staggering and uncertain-like across their path, and occasionally a gentle wind would stir the old tree tops, and scatter particles of water in all directions.

It was a night admirably adapted for the expedition Claude Duval and his party had come upon, on account of its many discomforts.

The old convent clock struck something, but the wind at the altitude of the clock-tower appeared to be restive and shifty, so that the sounds were vague and confused, and some of them, no doubt, did not reach the ears of Duval and his friends at all; but by calculation of time he well knew that it could not be yet near the hour for the lady abbess to expect him.

The uncertainty of the path they were pursuing—the report from Claude of what the abbess had said of unknown dangers being on all sides of them, and strange sighing sounds that the wind made now and then among the trees, all combined to infuse an odd feeling into the minds of the quiet little line of figures that crept so noiselessly along the garden path.

They looked more like spectres than living people at that solemn hour and in that strange place.

It was, probably, upon the constitutionally serious character of Jack that the greatest effect was produced; but he did not let the feeling show itself in any way that could interrupt the progress of the expedition.

The pathway in which they were became more and more gloomy, and Claude Duval felt confident that they had got to that part of it which he had noticed when he was with the abbess, and where the tall trees interlaced their branches overhead, and prevented the least vestige of the sky from being visible, and must, even at mid-day, have converted all below them into an impenetrable shade.

"Are you sure you are in the right track?" whispered Jack.

"Quite, Jack."

"That is well. And your key, Claude?"

"I have it here. We are now quite close to the mysterious little door that opens into the secret passage of the convent. I will try to do without a light if I can; but I rather think I shall have to ignite a match to enable me to find the key-hole."

"It may take some time to do so."

"It may; and I don't think that there will be any danger in it."

They now suddenly emerged from the dreary pathway in which they were, and came upon a small open space close to the building, which, amid the darkness of the night, in consequence of having its outline so completely blended with that darkness, looked of uncommon size.

"This should be the place," whispered Claude.

After feeling about the wall for some time, he feared that he might be a long time finding the door that he had to open with his master-key; so, as every moment was now valuable, he determined upon risking the faint light of a phosphorus match.

It would be very unlikely that any one would be sufficiently upon the look-out to see it, so Claude at once ignited it; and then he saw the little low-arched door in the wall.

"This will do," he said, as he placed his hand upon the key-hole, and threw down the match. "Now, my friends, silence as profound as death must be the order of the day, for in another moment we shall be within the convent."

The master-key that Duval had did its duty, and the little door in the wall slowly creaked open upon its seldom used hinges.

"Come on," whispered Duval, "I will leave the door close shut, but not locked, remember, and I will as we go on leave all the doors that I open in the same state, and then if anything should happen to me in the event of a tumult you will require no key to aid you in escaping in this direction."

"Don't think of that," said Mr. Field. "I for one will live or die with you, my friend."

Neither Dick nor Jack said a word. It was not exactly the time of day for them to make any protestations to Claude Duval. They both felt that he knew them too well to need any.

They all passed into the little secret passage, and Duval closed the door, but did not lock it.

"Now," he said, "before we go a step further I think it will be as well that we determine upon what we are to do if attacked by a host of these hags of women, who in this establishment lead a life of vice, and who think that they are called upon to obey the orders of the wretch who presides over them."

"I have been thinking of that," said Dick, "and I for one, if it can be at all avoided, don't like shooting a woman, let her scratch ever so."

"Nor do I," said Jack.

"But," added Dick, "I recollect what was once done in a case where an attack of women took place."

"What was it, Dick?"

"Pistols were loaded with powder, well rammed down with a good hard bit of wadding, and it was found that every one whom we fired at went down at once, and gave herself up as shot."

"Let us do it, then, with some of our arms. It will be well, though, to keep about us some pistols properly loaded."

"No doubt of that, for there is no knowing what may happen, and it is as well to be on the safe side."

Dick Turpin and the others now loaded each a pistol with rather an overcharge of powder, and rammed in very hard a bit of leather instead of a bullet, so that it would hit any one a good rap, but not in reality do any fatal injury. They then considered themselves prepared for any contingency that might occur.

It was quite impossible that darkness could be more intense than it was now as they entered this gloomy passage leading to the convent chapel. Claude Duval now paused for a moment, and spoke in a very low tone to his friends.

"Remember," he said, "that in the course of our progress now we shall pass within half-a-dozen paces of the abbess's room-door, and, therefore, that any sound coming to her ears will assuredly have the effect of bringing her out to see what it is. I don't mean to say that even then her appearance would have the effect of putting a stop to our plan of operations, but it might delay us."

"We should have to quiet her," said Jack.

"Yes, Jack, we would do that, but we don't know exactly what means she may have of giving an alarm to the rest of the convent; and what I specially wish to avoid is, a conflict with the nuns."

"Just so," said Dick; "it would be all kicking and scratching, you may depend upon it."

"Come on, then," said Claude. "I think you understand me now. All you have to do is to follow me in single file, and each of you to tread as lightly as he possibly can, so that his footfall may make no perceptible sound."

In this way, then, they went into the dreary passage, which led round by the route the abbess had shown to Duval to the chapel of the convent. Claude considered that it still, with all the delays that had taken place on account of Dennis and other matters, wanted an hour to the time when the abbess would be expecting him to make his appearance with the deed.

What might not be done by four determined men in an hour? And by such men, too, as those who were now within the convent walls. If the abbess had but had the least idea to whom she had opened the secrets of her establishment, she might well have trembled for its future stability.

But it was passion that had blinded that woman, who, under ordinary circumstances, would never have been deceived by the slight plot that had been brought to bear against her.

It she had not taken the unnatural liking that she had to Claude Duval, she would never have so far stultified her reason as to think that all was right in the way that it was going on; but when we find that she could go the length of asking Duval to take the life of Father Garvey, so that he should not be in the way of her new amour, we may judge how far gone the abbess was in the criminality of her passions.

CHAPTER CCCLXI.

THE RESCUE OF ALICIA AND THE TWO NOVICES, AND THE FATE OF DENNIS.

The necessity now for preserving the most cautious demeanour, if they would be successful in what they were meditating, was impressed strongly upon the minds of all those who were with Claude Duval upon this momentous occasion.

He had told them that in the course they would pursue they would have to pass so near to the chamber in the actual occupation of the lady abbess, that the least noise might have the effect of calling her forth to challenge them.

Claude went first, feeling his way as best he could, for he was afraid to have a light, lest some wandering ray of it should reach the abbess's observation; and yet he found it exceedingly difficult to get on with anything like facility without one.

Nevertheless he went on as best he could, and reached the foot of the flight of steps which he had before counted, upon the occasion of descending them in company with the abbess.

It was then only that Claude turned, and whispered softly—

"Be cautious. Here are stairs."

"Descending?" asked Turpin.

"No—no—they ascend."

"All's right, Claude. Go on."

"Hush! hush!"

The stairs were passed, a door was opened, and then Claude Duval felt certain that he was in the winding passage, which, in a very short time, would lead him close to the door of the abbess's room.

"Caution! caution!—much caution, now!" he whispered.

They all understood him and made the best possible reply they could to him by obeying the injunction in silence, and then on they went, till Duval suddenly found something in his way, over which he fell.

If he had not been going so exceedingly slow, with his hands stretched out before him, he certainly must have fallen; but, as it was, although he made a slight noise, it was not sufficient to give anything like an alarm.

Feeling, however, convinced that there was some obstruction now to his progress which it would not do to tamper with in the dark, Claude Duval, although he was very much averse to such a course, felt that he must have a light.

The hope he had was, that as the abbess would not be sitting in the dark, she would not see any ray from the little match which he proceeded to ignite, since it would present no contrast to the light in her own room.

"Dick!" whispered Claude, "there is something in the way."

"The deuce there is!"

"I am going to light a match just for a moment."

"Ah, do so."

The phosphorus match lit noiselessly; and when the wood-work was in a flame Claude saw that a stool was placed exactly in the centre of the passage, with a large glass goblet upon it. The goblet had been only slightly moved by the touch he had given to the stool; but another such slight touch would have sent it to the floor, when it must have made quite noise enough in breaking to alarm the abbess.

There could be no doubt but she had placed that obstruction in the way of Claude's return in order that, without the trouble of waiting for him, she might be let know when he was near at hand.

"Cunning enough, but it won't do," said Duval, as he placed the goblet close to the wall, and put the stool out of the way.

"Does she suspect you?" whispered Mr. Field.

"I think not."

"And I hope not."

"Come on, now—the match is out; and, whether she suspects me or not, we will rescue those whom we came here to save."

Claude Duval, while he had had the phosphorus match alight, had taken a glance in advance of him, and had been quite convinced that there was no further obstruction to his progress, so now he advanced in the dark with much greater confidence than before.

A few moments sufficed to enable him to reach the turn in the secret passage, which would bring him past the panel in the wall of the abbess's room.

To get past that point was everything, for when once that was done, every step would take them further from the chances of any interruption, and nearer to the gloomy cells in which, with more or less patience, rested the victims that they had come to save.

"More caution still," whispered Claude, for he was fearful that not being cognisant of the exact spot where the danger lay, one or other of those he had with him might say something.

Claude started back a step or two, for suddenly a gleam of light shot across the passage.

"Down!" he said.

They all crouched down to the floor, and then the panel in the wall of the abbess's chamber was opened about eight inches or so, and she looked out.

The gleam of light did not come from any lamp she carried in her hand, but from the tall candle that was burning upon the table in the room.

Claude Duval could see her face quite plainly, and her hand, as she held the edge of the panel with it.

"All still," she said, "all still. He comes not yet, but he will come. I am foolish to expect him so soon, or to be so very anxious about him. No doubt he will come, and he mentioned to me the shortest possible space of time that would elapse before I saw him again. I must be patient—patient. All is still."

She closed the panel.

What a relief it was to Duval when he heard the click of the spring of the panel go into its place again, and saw a very thin pencil of light that shone through a crevice, and just revealed where the panel was; nothing was observable of the opening in the wall.

"An escape," he said, in a whisper, "quite an escape. Come on now slowly and surely—come on."

They did not dare any of them to speak to him, but they had not advanced many paces when they heard, or thought they heard, for they could not feel quite sure about it, the faint ringing of a bell as if a long way off.

Claude paused and listened intently, for something came across him to the effect that that ringing of a bell had something to do with the affair he had on hand.

Not many moments elapsed before he was convinced that it not only had something to do with it, but that the something was of great importance.

The abbess's voice came rather sharply upon the silence of the night, being only on the other side of the panel, as she said—

"What is it now? Am I never to be left to myself? How dare you intrude upon me at this hour?"

Claude Duval and his party remained as still as death itself to listen to what might now take place in the abbess's room.

In a very bumble voice, indeed, some one replied to the imperious abbess, and the tone in which the reply was made was so low, that neither Duval nor any of those who were with him could catch the purport even of the words.

When the abbess again spoke, however, in her full, round, commanding voice, there was no sort of difficulty in catching every word she uttered.

"A man wants to see me?" she cried. "What do you mean by disturbing me about him? Who and what is he, pray, that I am to be roused even from my devotions at such an hour as this to see him?"

Again the voice said something in reply in the same low tone as before, and which Claude Duval was very much annoyed to find that he could not catch; but the abbess was kind enough to relieve him from that difficulty, for she cried out in an angry voice—

"Speak up, idiot! Am I to trouble myself to listen to your whimpering?"

"Thank you," thought Claude.

Upon this command, the person who had brought a message to the lady abbess spoke up clearly enough, saying—

"Holy madam, I don't pretend to know who it is at all, nor do I take upon myself to say that you ought to have been disturbed; but Sister Mary thought that it was worth while bringing the message to you, as it might be important."

"Well—well, what is it?"

"A man, then, at the outer gate, who says that his name is Dennis, wishes to see you in order to tell you that there is a plot going on for the purpose of taking a novice from the convent this very night."

"Absurd! What plot? What novice?"

"He declared that he would not tell any one but yourself, or a priest."

"A priest? Why, what sort of a man must he be who waits for a priest before he can make a confidence? Who and what is he?"

"He is an Irishman, and by his language belongs to the lower order of society."

"Stuff! I won't see him."

"Very well, holy mother. I will have him sent away from the gate at once."

"Stop—stop! A plot to take away a novice? Stop a moment. Can it be possible? No—no, surely no—it cannot be. What am I to think? This foolish communication has the effect of distracting me, whether it be true or false. Did he give no further information than what you have told me?"

"None whatever."

"But you say he is an Irishman. Could you not manage to get from him what he has to say without my being troubled with him?"

"I fear not, holy mother. Like the rest of his class, he makes up for the want of education and its advantages by the possession of that low cunning, which is taught to him, and to such as he, from their earliest infancy."

"You are right there. I don't think that there is anything—I don't think that there can be anything in this pretended communication that he has to make to me; but, still, there are circumstances which make it desirable that I should run no risks just now, so I will see him. I have still half an hour to spare," muttered the abbess to herself, as the attendant left the room.

When the abbess was alone, she paced the room to and fro for its whole length—and that was no trifle—with disordered steps. It was quite evident that the communication which had been made to her had had the effect of distracting her mind very much, and, probably, of giving her doubts of the good faith of the Mr. White of whom she had thought so much.

"What can it mean?" she said—"what can it all mean? A plot for the escape of a novice from this convent? Oh, impossible! We are too well protected here. But, yet, I will hear what this man has to say. It is possible that his arrival here may be the beginning of the plot."

The abbess stopped short in her peregrinations to and fro in the room as this idea struck her. It was not a very unnatural one, considering all things.

"Yes," she added, "there may, indeed, be a plot, and this man's arrival here the commencement of it. He may be in disguise! Ah! let him beware! Let him attempt, by finesse, to gain any purpose here, and I think he will find me a match for him. I will hear him, and then woe be to him if I suspect him even!"

CHAPTER CCCLXII.

DENNIS MAKES ALL THE MISCHIEF HE POSSIBLY CAN IN HIS INTERVIEW WITH THE ABBESS.

THIS inopportune visit of Dennis at the convent was to Claude Duval and his party one of the most serious cross accidents that could possibly have happened to them. It was of the utmost importance, too, that they should find out how much Dennis knew of the projected escape from the convent of Alicia, for the amount of that knowledge would be a good index of the amount of his powers of mischief.

Feeling, therefore, that there was but little time to spare in the matter, and that each minute that Alicia and the other young creatures who were imprisoned in the cells beneath the convent must seem as hours of anxiety and suspense, yet Claude Duval was assured that he could not do better just then than remain where he was, and endeavour to find out the full extent of the powers of mischief of Mr. Dennis.

The angry and excited way in which the abbess was now again marching to and fro in the room gave Claude Duval an opportunity of speaking to his friends without the fear of being overheard, for the abbess made by far too much noise by her perambulations, and was by far too much occupied by her own thoughts and muttered suppositions, to hear a cautiously-uttered whisper or two on the other side of the panel in the wall.

"Turpin," whispered Claude Duval, "where are you?"

"Here, Claude; and Jack, and Mr. Field are close to me. We can all hear anything you have to say."

"Did you all hear what passed in the abbess's room?"

"We did, indeed."

"Then such being the case, I hope you will agree with me that the best thing we can all of us do now is to wait a little, and hear the end of it."

"Not a doubt of that," said Jack.

Mr. Field sighed deeply, and Duval hearing him, said to him—

"It is with very great regret, Mr. Field, that I council any delay in your and in our proceeding. If I acted just up to my own feelings in the matter without thought, I should go on at once and seek Alicia in the cells beneath the convent; but reflection tells me that it will be much better we should know what is the amount of information your man, Dennis, possesses, and what is the amount of credence given to it by the abbess."

"You are right—you are right, Duval."

"I am glad you think so, and I don't think you would say so if you did not think it."

"Indeed, I would not. My reason tells me you are right, although you may easily imagine that my feelings are a little at war with that conclusion."

"I can easily imagine it, and I assure you, sir, that you shall not find me delay one moment longer than necessary."

"Hush!" said Turpin, who had placed his ear close to the panel. "Her ladyship, the abbess, is going to give us some further information."

The fall of a glass in the abbess's room at that moment attracted the attention of Duval and his friends, and then they heard her say—

"How nervous I am to-night. I tremble so that I cannot even hold a glass. Who is there?"

The voice of the attendant now sounded upon the ears of the listeners, saying—

"The man is here, holy mother."

"Admit him, but do you remain close to the door in the passage yonder, so that you may have no difficulty in hearing my bell if I should sound it."

"Yes, holy mother."

There was a slight bustle at the door of the abbess's room, and then the listeners heard Dennis, in a whispering manner, saying—

"Oh, by all the holy saints, and isn't it a mighty great thing for me to have the honour of an interview with your mightiness. The saints be good to us all! Amen! amen! amen!"

"Silence."

"Yes, ma'am, if you please, ma'am, it's silent I'll be. I come of a silent family, ma'am. The Ballgudries of Tipperary, ma'am. Saints look down on us!"

"You profess our holy faith?"

"Surely, ma'am, yes, I do. What the priest says is right, ma'am, so you see it saves a poor man a world of trouble, you see, ma'am."

"That is true. You take quite a correct view of the case. And now, they tell me that you know something of a plot to take a novice from the convent."

"Faith, then, I do, ma'am. They say that this convent is no better, ma'am, than it ought to be, but what's the odd's as long as it is a holy place, ma'am? And sure if the prastes, and the abbesses, and the likes of yourself, ma'am, choose to do anything by way of a little amusement, it's all right with the saints and the holy people, you see, ma'am, and it isn't for the likes of me to say black is the white of your eye, you know, ma'am, an' I'm quite sure that no luck comes from going to thwart the praste or the ladies of the convent, ma'am. That's what I think, ma'am."

"Your thoughts do you credit so far as they go; but tell me, who is the novice you suspect is to be taken from the convent?"

"It's Alicia, ma'am, they call her."

"Alicia?"

"Truth, ma'am, and that same was the name I heard 'em call her over and over again, ma'am, and it's myself would scorn to tell you a lie, ma'am; about it."

"Go on—go on, I wish to hear all."

"Well, ma'am, they wanted to make out that you wanted to get her money, and that the holy man of a praste was rather fond of her, ma'am; but, as I say, if you do wish to get her money I'd like to know who has a greater right to it than the holy church that saves souls? and if the praste, blessed man, does look with the corner of his holy eye at a pretty girl, where's the harm? and it's quite a sin of anybody to interfere with his reverence's little amusements, and she needn't be so mighty particular."

"True—true, that is all correct; but who are the people you speak of that say such things?"

"Well, my lady, I tried to find out, but they began to talk about something else just as I was getting all the news. My master, ma'am, has got them to help him and no mistake, though."

"Who is your master?"

"Truth, ma'am, and it's Mr. Field that's me master."

"Field? I know that name. Then there is some truth in your communication. I remember that name well. I rather think, though, that I have an ally in Mr. White, the attorney, who will get the better of him. But tell me, what is Mr. Field's plan of operation?"

"The operation, ma'am?"

"Yes—yes."

"The—a—the plan, ma'am?"

"Yes; do you not understand me? You say they intend to try to get the novice, Alicia, out of the convent, and I want to know how they mean to try to do it."

"Oh, yes, ma'am. Well, then, that I don't know."

"You don't know?"

"Bedad no, ma'am. The cunning of 'em, ma'am, bates all the world, and knowing that they are going to come here to-night and interfere with your ladyship and the other holy people, I don't know how they mane to do it."

"Then you have arrived at the end of your communication?"

"The end of what, ma'am?"

"Of your statement."

"Oh, yes. The end of it did you say, ma'am? Which end, ma'am?"

"Idiot! I mean, that you have now nothing more to tell me?"

"Oh, yes, ma'am—that's it is it, ma'am? Well, then, all I have to say is, that there's four of 'em now, along with the master—that's Mr. Field, as I told you, ma'am—and they mane to try something to-night, as safe as potatoes, ma'am; so I thought that, just for the good of the holy father, I'd come and tell you, and may be, thought I, it will be good service done to the saints, after all."

"It will—it will. I am much beholden to you, and will reward you well."

"Many thanks to you, my lady. It's a hard case indeed that the holy fathers can't amuse themselves a little with a heretic of a girl but there it to be a riot and a rackit about it."

"Can you fight?"

"Is it fight, ma'am? Hubabboo! Whoop! Yes, ma'am, I'm of the rale ould fighting stock, ma'am, any way."

"Then if ever you fought in your life it is your duty to fight for your church."

"Yes, ma'am, and I will, faith. There is only one of the fellows with the master that one may be much afraid of, and truth, then, he seems to be a born devil he does."

"Who is he?"

"I don't know who he is, my lady, but he is a fellow that it's much better to put a bullet in from behind a hedge quiet and easy than to come to fisty cuffs with."

"Is he so powerful a man?"

"Why, my lady, praise be to the saints, he is not so mighty big as he is a cute and knowing-looking sort of fellow, and he is good-looking, too, in his way, with his black locks of long hair, and his fine moustachoes, my lady, and his elegant lawn cravat——"

"Hold! What do you say? His moustachoes? Has he rather large and handsome black eyes?"

"True for you, he has, my lady."

"And a dark but clear complexion? And when he smiles does he look like—like——"

"A mighty good-looking fellow, my lady."

"Yes—yes."

"Then that's the same man, my lady, any way, and he is the leader of the whole of them, and is telling of 'em what to do, and a mighty ugly creature, I'm after thinking, he would be, my lady."

"Ruined! Lost—lost! Ruined!" sobbed the abbess, as she clasped her hands over her face and rocked to and fro in an agony of rage and apprehension.

"Is it ruined you are, ma'am? Well, I shouldn't have thought it."

"Oh, horror—horror! All is over—over now!"

"You don't say so, ma'am?"

"Oh, all other misfortunes were nothing to this. I have had misfortunes, but this one is the worst of all."

"And you have had misfortunes, ma'am, really now? Did any of 'em live?"

"Sir? What do you mean?"

THE LADY ABBESS POINTS OUT THE SECRET PASSAGE TO CLAUDE.

"The misfortunes, ma'am. We call 'em misfortunes in ould Ireland, ma'am, whether they are girls or boys, ma'am."

"Wretch, how dare you insult me! My vengeance shall at least reach you. If I cannot be revenged upon the villain that I would fain have in my grasp, I will at least embrace the one that is so."

"Oh, murder, my lady! Don't be after making a victim of me! Murder! Oh, there, be easy."

"Stop!"

"Yes, my lady."

"You say you can fight?"

"Bedad, yes, my lady."

"You shall, then."

"With all the pleasure in life, my lady. Only put me in the way of it, and it is myself that will fight—only show me the thick hedge to get behind, and a gun in my hand, and then won't I fight like a lion, my lady, and hit down the man that little expects it as he goes along, fine and aisy, on the other side."

The abbess rose and paced to a remote corner of the room, and opening a cupboard that was there, she took from it a double-barrelled, rather short gun, and placed it in the hands of Dennis.

"Go," she said. "There is not a moment to lose. Go down the lane till you see the branches of a tree projecting over the wall. Hide yourself any way you can, and wait till the man you have described comes to that spot. Let him get to the top of the wall, and then shoot him."

"Shoot him?"

"Yes, shoot him. He will fall into the garden if you manage well, and I shall have the pleasure of looking at his dead body. Go. When the deed is done, come to me here again for your reward."

"Trust me for that, my lady."

"Go at once. Take this ring. The production of it to the porter at the gate will pass you here again upon your return. You will find an attendant in waiting, who will show you out. There is not a moment to lose."

Dennis left the room, and the abbess, with a scream of rage and disappointment, fell to the floor.

CHAPTER CCCLXIII.

THE HORRORS OF THE CONVENT WELL ARE BROUGHT TO LIGHT.

This mode of tactics that was adopted by the abbess happened to suit Claude Duval and his friends very well indeed, considering that they had made good their entrance to the convent, and stood in no sort of fear of the gun with which Dennis was armed to repel any attack from without with.

If Dennis had happened to have arrived at the convent a little sooner, say an hour or so, they might have run some risk from the murderous way in which he would, no doubt, have carried out the abbess's orders.

"Now," whispered Claude to his friends—"now that we know all that there is to know regarding Dennis and his operations, let us at once proceed on our mission. It is evident that the abbess has no notion that we have already got within the convent walls."

"Not the least," said young Field, in a tone of joy, although he took good care at the same time not to speak loud enough for there to be any danger of his being overheard by the abbess—"not the least; and I do, indeed, now think that I shall soon behold my Alicia."

They now passed the secret little panelled door leading from the abbess's room to the dark and dreary passage with which, no doubt, the convent was, as such places usually are, well provided; and as at each step that they now took they discovered the danger of being overheard by the abbess, they felt their heads grow lighter, and a strange and more fearful assurance growing upon them that they would not succeed in rescuing the fair victims of the conventual system from the terrors that surrounded them.

Claude Duval quickened his pace now each moment and soon reached the door that opened into the chapel behind the altar. The moment he opened it, a rush of cool, grateful fresh air came upon their faces, and they stepped from the now gloomy passage with a feeling of thankfulness to escape from it.

A strange feeling of awe came over Turpin and Jack and Mr. Field as they now found themselves in what, in truth, was the rather large extent of the chapel.

There was a dreamy sort of stillness in the air which might have produced that effect, or was it from the fact that places dedicated to the worship of the Great Being who is the Creator and the Lord of Heaven and of Earth carry with them a feeling of sanctity, which even the most wicked and corrupt cannot shake off?

It may be so.

"And this is the chapel?" said Dick.

"It is," whispered Claude.

"How still and solemn!"

"My flesh creeps upon my bones," said Jack.

"How chill the air is, too."

"Come, come," said Claude Duval, "don't let the silence and the strangeness of this place infect you both with unknown fears."

"No, no."

"Forward! Follow me! We are behind what they call the high altar, now; but there is no possible occasion for us to linger in this place."

"On—on, then!" said Jack.

Claude Duval went forward carefully, for he recollected that there was a short flight of stairs to descend from the place in which he was in order to reach the body of the chapel. Fearing that his comrades might, if not in time warned of their existence, fall over them and so make more noise than would be at all desirable, he turned and said—

"Steps!"

That one word was sufficient to induce them to use the greatest caution in proceeding, so that they all descended from the raised portion of the chapel on which the altar stood with perfect safety.

"Now," said Claude, "we are not far from Alicia."

"Oh! joyful thought!" said Field.

"Hush!" said Turpin; "I am not accustomed to this place, of course, and it is possible that some accidental noise may have deceived me, but I thought I heard a groan."

"Let us all listen."

Jack bent his head right down to the floor of the chapel to listen; and then they all heard very clearly and distinctly a deep, hollow groan.

Claude Duval started.

"Did you hear it, Turpin?"

"I did."

"And you, Mr. Field?"

"Yes, yes."

"Can any of you fix the locality of it?"

They were all at fault in that particular. They had all heard the groan, but it seemed as if it floated in the very air of the chapel; and, at all events, it was quite impossible that any of them should take upon himself to point out any particular spot and say, "It is from there."

After listening for a few moments longer and finding that the groan was not repeated, Claude Duval spoke in a low and cautious tone of voice.

"I do not think," he said "we ought to let this circumstance stop us in our enterprise. Heaven only knows to what an extent these villanous conventual mysteries are carried on in this place, and what may be the amount of suffering contingent upon it; but as far as we are concerned we have now a distinct enterprise before us, and we should pursue it heedless of what may stand in the way."

How grateful young Field felt to Claude Duval for those few words!

"I agree with you," said Turpin; "we will follow you, Claude."

"This way, then."

With the master-key in his grasp that would open the mysterious door by the side of the confessional, Claude Duval crept along the aisle of the chapel in which that door was situated, and soon, as he thought, came to the confessional.

"This is the place," he said.

They all came to a halt.

Claude Duval now felt with great care all along the wall; but with the utmost caution and carefulness that he could use, he could not find the key-hole in the door, and wondered much what could be the cause of its disappearance.

"Can't you get on?" whispered Turpin.

"No, Dick."

"What's the matter?"

"I can't find the key-hole of the door, and I suppose the only plan will be to have a light at any risk. Just light a match, Dick, and hold it for me here, as I have the key in my hand."

"Yes, in a moment."

Dick Turpin quickly ignited a little match, and when the flame caught the wood Claude Duval could see the cause of his disappointment easily enough. There were several confessionals in a row, and the one that he had stopped at was not the one that was close to the portion of the wall which opened to the gloomy vaults and cells beneath the convent.

"I see, now," said Claude, "it is further on."

Mr. Field drew a long breath of relief. He was afraid when he saw the hesitation of Claude that the secret door in the wall was much too carefully hidden to be found again, and that it was just possible his Alicia might not be saved by those even who were willing to risk so much for her.

"Can you see it now?" he said, as Claude paused again, just as the match was going out.

"Yes."

"Oh, thank Heaven!"

"You should not have despaired, Mr. Field, even if the door had eluded all possible observation."

"But what could we have done?"

"What could we have done? I would have had up the floor of the chapel; and if that would not have succeeded, I would go outside and begin upon the convent brick by brick and stone by stone till I had revealed to the world the secrets of this most vile and detestable prison-house."

"Oh, my friend, the more I know of you the more surely do I feel that you will place my Alicia in my arms again."

"I will."

Claude opened the door in the chapel wall easily enough now, and just as the match burnt to the last portion, and Dick Turpin was compelled to drop it from between his fingers, they all caught a glimpse of the dark and gloomy-looking region which lay in the direction of the vaults, and directly through the door that Claude Duval had opened with his master-key.

"Let us descend a few steps," said Claude, "so as to get clear of the chapel, and then, Jack, you can light the little hand-lantern you have with you."

"I can," said Jack.

"Be careful of the steps. They are both narrow and steep."

This caution was really well needed, for the steps were both narrow and steep, and, besides, so dusty that the foot could hardly get a firm hold of them in descending.

After they had got about six steps down, Claude closed the door, and said to Jack—

"Quick with your lantern, now, Jack, I wish to see if there be any fastening to the door upon this side, for if so, I will take good care that we are not interrupted by the lady abbess or any of the old nuns while we are here."

Jack had in his pocket one of those small well-made hand-lanterns with a powerful bull's-eye lever, and a good reflector, so that when he lit it he could throw a strong stream of light upon any object that it was requisite to examine.

"Now, Jack, turn the light upon the door."

Jack did so, and by moving the lantern slowly up and down he showed the door plainly to Duval, and at the same time plainly showed him that there were no means of fastening it on the inner side.

"We must take our chance," said Duval. "Come on."

The impatience of Claude now to reach the cells, and to assure the unhappy prisoners there confined of their safety was very great, and he made good speed to the foot of the steep staircase. When there, the lantern did not burn so brightly as it had done above, which was a sufficient indication of the badness of the air, even if their own sensations had not sufficiently informed them of that fact.

"This is a terrible place," said Jack.

"Alas! it is," said Mr. Field. "Oh, gentlemen, only think of a young and innocent girl, who has been accustomed to all the luxuries and all the amenities of life being suddenly snatched from the world and shut up in such a region as this. Alicia—my Alicia, how can I ever make amends to you for your sufferings?"

"The joy of deliverance from this prison-house," said Claude, "will obliterate all the pangs of the past. This way—on—on."

Duval strode on quickly, closely followed by Jack, who held the lantern in such a position that it spread the greatest amount of light upon the pathway that he, Claude, was pursuing, and in this way the open space where the well was situated was gained, and they all paused a moment to look up at the vaulted roof of that strange-looking abode.

"This," said Claude, "is beneath the floor of the chapel, no doubt. This way, Mr. Field. Follow me closely, sir."

"It did not need many injuntions to induce Field to follow Claude Duva closely, and the latter made his way at once to the cell in which Alicia, with the young novice as her companion, had been left.

"Call to her," said Claude to Mr. Field.

With a shriek of joy, the young lover shouted—"Alicia—Alicia!"

Scarcely had the sound time to echo through the vaulted roof of that dismal place than there was an answering cry, and from the cell in which Claude Duval had advised Alicia to remain, she rushed forth into her lover's arms.

Claude Duval and his friends stepped back a pace or two in respect to the gush of feeling which was called forth by this truly happy meeting.

For some seconds neither of the young lovers spoke; but deep sobs came from the heart of Field as he wound his arm round the fair form of the young girl whom he loved so well, while she seemed hardly able to believe in the reality of the fact that she was once more with him, and that he had come to save her.

When he could speak it was only in disjointed words and sentences that he could utter the full joy that was at his heart.

"My darling—my own Alicia—my beautiful—my own dearest! Is this a dream, or do I, indeed, hold you again to my heart?"

"'Save me! save me!" she cried.

"Yes—yes, I will save you! Oh, look up, and let me once more see that dear face."

"It cannot be!" sobbed Alicia. "This is some mockery—some vision, and I am mad!"

Claude Duval now stepped forward, and in a soft and gentle voice, he said—

"Do you remember me?"

Still convulsively clinging to her lover, Alicia turned and looked at him. The tears streamed down her cheeks then, and releasing Field from her nervous grasp, she clasped her hands, and replied—

"Oh, yes. God bless you! You have, indeed, saved me."

"It is no dream," said Claude. "I have accompanied Mr. Field to this place in order that he may snatch you from it. Believe me, Alicia, that you will be free. There are enough of us to save you. But how is your young companion?"

"I have two companions now. Oh, there has been a fearful scene enacted here."

CHAPTER CCCLXIV.

THE ESCAPE FROM THE CONVENT CELLS IS ENVIRONED BY DANGERS.

When Claude Duval spoke of her young companion he meant the novice whom he had placed with Alicia, and who he was glad happened to be in the cells to keep her company, and when Alicia said that a fearful scene had been enacted there, she alluded to the young creature who had been taken to the cells by the order of the abbess, after Claude Duval had left them.

"What scene do you allude to, dearest?" said Field. "Have you suffered further privations since this gentleman saw you?"

"Oh, no—no! but much terrors. Come this way, and then I will tell you all."

Alicia led them to the cell which she had so recently left, and when the light of Jack's lantern fell upon its gloomy interior, they all stood for a few moments transfixed, regarding the scene that was there to be observed.

Kneeling upon the floor of the cell was the young novice that Claude Duval had left with Alicia, and lying with her head upon her lap was the young creature who with such blows and violence had been dragged to that place by the orders of the abbess.

That poor young girl seemed to be dead, and the novice was shedding tears, which fell upon her face.

"There," said Alicia, sobbing, "is the sight that I wanted you to see."

"It is woeful," said Claude.

"Are we all to die now?" said the novice, looking up with such an expression of grief and resignation, that it was truly sad to look at her.

"No, no, dear friend," said Alicia. "Look at this gentleman. Do you not know him? He has come to save us."

"To save me?—oh, God!"

"Yes, to save you. From this moment, with the exception that it will take some little time to get from the place, you are free."

"Can this be possible?"

"It is true," said Claude.

The girl sobbed as though her heart would break. Never until that moment had she been able to comprehend the full possibility of being carried from the convent cells; but when she heard that Alicia believed it, and when she saw what appeared to her a crowd of well armed and valiant men at the door of the cell, and heard that they were resolved to take her from the convent, she could no longer doubt the fact of her deliverance, and the pent up feelings of her heart could only find a vent in tears.

"Let her weep," said Alicia.

"Yes," said Claude, "those are tears of joy."

"They are indeed," said Mr. Field. "But is that young creature who lies so still, really dead?"

"I hope not."

"No," said Alicia, "she is not dead, but she is in a sort of trance from which we have sought in vain to arouse her."

"Poor girl."

"I will tell you how it all happened," added Alicia, sobbing at the mere recollection of the misery that the young creature had gone through.

"Stop a moment," said Claude. "Let us try if we cannot recover her. I have taken care to have with me a restorative in case of need; for coming into such a gloomy place as this, I did not know what possible necessities might arise."

By the aid of Alicia and the novice, the unhappy girl, who had been condemned to death in those cells for what she had said to the wicked abbess of the convent, was raised to a sitting posture, and then Claude bathed her temples with brandy, and placed some upon her lips.

It was some few minutes before even the power of the strong spirit had any effect in recovering her from the state of stupor into which she had fallen.

"Couldn't you give her a little drop of the brandy?" said Jack.

"No—no, it would choke her."

"Well, it might, poor girl."

"Look—she moves," said Turpin.

"You speak to her, Alicia," said Mr. Field. "Does she know you?"

"Oh, yes, she loved me well."

"Ah, all love you!"

With a shudder, the girl opened her eyes, and looked wildly about her and then in a low wailing voice she said—

"Cruel, cruel to kill me because, I would not do wrong. Oh, God, is there no justice in Heaven for these people? Help! oh, help!"

"Dear Helen," said Alicia, as she took her hand. "Do you not know me? I am your friend, Alicia."

The girl looked at her, and then shaking her head, she said—

"Yes, I will forgive you."

"For what, Helen? Oh! surely you do not mock me with such speeches! I, too, am a victim of the abbess's, and am here now to save you, along with these dear friends, who will aid us both."

The girl dashed aside the clustering ringlets of her hair, and looked with surprise upon one and the other of the faces around her.

"Oh! do not—do not!" she sobbed.

"Do not what?"

"Do not deceive me, I beg of you, or you will kill me!"

"Dear friend," said Alicia, "I am not deceiving you. Here is Mr. Field, of whom you have heard me speak, and these are friends of his who have come with him, making their way through difficulty and danger into the convent to save us. They will take us out of the power of the abbess; and the law of England, which guards, at all events, the liberty of those who appeal to it, will protect us."

The girl flung herself into the arms of Alicia, and laughed and sobbed by turns upon her bosom.

"Now I do believe," she said, "that it is not a dream. Oh, God! I shall see the blessed sunshine once again!—I shall once again look upon kindly faces that I love, and I shall yet be happy!"

"You will, dear friend, you will."

Claude and his friends looked at each other and then stepped aside a moment, to let the feelings of the young girls have free play. They, too, were deeply affected by the scene of mingled joy and sorrow that was pictured in the strange place.

"Oh, what a system must this be," said Duval, "that permits one portion of human nature to assume so awful an authority over another!"

"It is truly dreadful!" said Turpin. "I would have every convent, if I had my own way, levelled with the ground."

"And I!" said Jack.

"Amen, say I!" responded Claude.

Mr. Field now touched Claude Duval upon the arm.

"My good friend," he said, "I think that our invalid prisoner has sufficiently recovered to proceed. Shall we now proceed to leave this place, which can only be full of the most painful recollections to us all?"

"Yes, at once."

The three young girls, with faces now radiant with hope, stood ready to proceed with their deliverers. They seemed to think that they were now beyond all chances of any ill; and, in the faith they had in the power and prowess of those who had reached them in those gloomy vaults, they found the greatest argument to believe that with success they would take them from the dreary region they were in to liberty and light.

There needed no impulse to Claude Duval and his friends to do their best to bring this adventure to a happy termination; but if anything could have added to their resolve to do so, it certainly would be found in the confidence with which the young girls regarded them.

"At another time, Alicia," said Claude, "you shall tell us all that has happened in this miserable place since I was here last. At present, let us think of nothing but your deliverance from durance here."

The order in which they proposed to leave the cells was now duly arranged by Claude Duval.

"You, Mr. Field," he said, "will, of course, take care of Alicia—you, Dick, attend to one of the young ladies, and you, Jack, to the other. I will go first, as I know the way well by this time, and as I have the key that opens all the doors that may be in our way."

When thus arranged, they formed quite a little procession, and Claude said, with a smile—

"I think that if we meet any of the old nuns, who merely came into this convent on account of despairing of ever getting husbands, they will be ready to die with envy to see us all."

The novices smiled, and looked as happy as one may well suppose people to look who are being saved from torments and, perhaps, death.

"We all look like your children," said Mr. Field, "and as if we were following you for a walk."

"Thank you," said Duval; "now, really, I did not think I had such a fatherly look about me; but, I suppose, I must put up with that on account of the credit of being supposed to have such a fine family."

This little badinage raised the spirits of the poor captives, and they smiled through their tears, and felt happier than they had been for many a day.

Claude Duval, as he passed the well, cast a glance at it, and looked at Mr. Field, as he said, in a low tone—

"That holds a few secrets, no doubt?"

"It does, indeed."

The girls trembled as they passed that well, for they knew that several of the nuns, who had turned refractory to the orders of the abbess, had disappeared suddenly; and the idea that they had been cast down that well was the one most prevalent in the convent among the novices.

Claude rushed on at the head of the procession, and Jack still carried the lantern, until they came to the little staircase that led up into the chapel, and then Duval paused a moment.

"Let me caution you all," he said, "now to be as careful as you can not to give any alarm as we proceed through the chapel."

"We will."

"It is not that I think there is any force here that can possibly compete with us; but I do not wish to provoke a conflict, which might be one of life and death, and would cost us dear, although we might gain the victory. I have good reason to know, too, that the abbess has fire-arms."

"I approve of your caution," said Mr. Field. "It will be everything to get out of the convent by stratagem instead of force."

"Come on, then, cautiously."

Claude Duval slowly ascended the narrow stairs towards the door leading into the chapel, and they all followed him. It was not till he got within some half dozen steps of the top of the stairs, that he heard a strange, grinding kind of noise from the chapel, and he paused to listen to it.

The noise was as if some one were at work with some carpenter's tools in the place, and yet nothing could very well be more improbable than that anything of the sort should be going on in the chapel.

"Is anything amiss?" said Turpin.

"I hardly know."

"Do you hear anything?" said Mr. Field.

THE ABBESS PLACES CLAUDE IN AMBUSH TO ASSASSINATE THE CONFESSOR.

"Hush! Speak low, and come forward here both of you, and listen. There is a very odd noise in the chapel."

"Oh, Heaven help us!" said Helen.

"Hush! I beg of you, ladies," said Claude. "Any indiscretion now, may place us in a very awkward position. Let me beg of you to be silent."

"We will—we will."

"Hush! hush!"

The silence in the mysterious passage was now very profound, indeed; so much so, that it would have been positively painful to have continued it for long; but, happily, there was no occasion for so doing, inasmuch as the noise in the chapel was of a character that quickly explained itself, and Claude Duval said, in a whisper, to those who were with him—

"Don't be alarmed. I don't myself consider that it is of much consequence; but it is quite clear that they are nailing up the door leading from here into the chapel."

"Then we are lost!"

"No, no, Alicia. Do not say that."

"But what can we do?"

"Of that we will think forthwith; and, in the meantime, let me beg of you to take heart, and by no means to despair."

"We will never despair while you do not," said young Field.

"Well spoke," said Turpin. "Hush! They are at it again."

Bang! bang! bang! came three terrible blows upon the door, and then they heard a voice say—"It is finished."

CHAPTER CCCLXV.

THE ABBESS, BY THE AID OF DENNIS, TRIES HER BEST TO DESTROY HER FOES.

THERE was no difficulty in detecting to whom that voice belonged. It was the voice of the abbess of the convent; and what she said meant, that she had given the finishing stroke to the fastening up of the door leading to the vaults and the cells.

Before, then, Claude Duval and his friends could address a word to each other, or come to any definite conclusion as to what to do, they heard some one say—

"Yes, my lady; and, bedad, you may say that, wid your own swate lips, my lady, and divil a bit of a lie."

"Silence!" said the abbess.

That Dennis was now with the abbess again, and that in some way she had learnt that Duval was actually in the vaults with his friends, there could be no doubt. The only mystery was, as regarded how she had managed to make that discovery, and recall Dennis so quickly from the garden-wall, whither, it will be recollected, she had sent him to wait for the arrival of those whose object in coming to the convent she was so very anxious to defeat.

But, still, the how she had got her information was of little consequence, compared to the fact that she had got it, and was acting upon it, to the extent of her abilities and means; and as regarded the rapidity of her movements, that was a matter that was much more apparent than real, for, to tell the truth, Claude Duval and his friends had been longer in the gloomy regions beneath the chapel than they thought.

Time to the wisest gets measured much more by its events than by its actual progess, so the abbess had had plenty of leisure to increase her information and to act upon it.

How she had received it was one of the mysteries of the convent that still remained to be solved.

Claude Duval now spoke in a low tone to his friends, saying, as he turned to them—

"It seems to me to be very improbable that the abbess, even with the assistance of Dennis, has been able to fasten the door leading to the chapel so firmly as to resist all our endeavours to force it, and I advise that we wait a little until there may be the chance of her leaving the spot, and then make the attempt."

"Be it so," said Field.

"Be careful, though," said Alicia; "you do not know that desperate and revengeful woman yet."

"As how?" said Claude.

"I mean to say, that she will adopt any possible mode of accomplishing her desire for revenge, and what she seems to be actually about, is sometimes the furthest from her evil intentions."

"Is she so very cunning?"

"Indeed she is."

"Ah, yes," said the other two girls.

"Well, well, don't despair," said Claude. "What I think of doing now, is to make an attempt on the door; so just wait quietly for me where you are, all of you, till I report progress."

This they promised to do, and Jack quite extinguished the little light he had, so that it should not by any possibility be seen in the chapel, and then Claude advanced alone to the door, and placed his ear against it and listened.

All seemed to be as still as the very grave in the chapel.

"Is this silence real or assumed?" said Claude to himself. "I wonder if, relying upon the strength of the door, and the efficiency of the means she has used to fasten it, this woman really thinks that we are to be left here quietly to die of starvation. She must be mad to dream that we can be so utterly destitute of all resources."

Again he listened, but not the smallest sound disturbed the intense stillness of the chapel, so that he at last began to think that it must be deserted by the abbess and the nuns.

With this idea, Claude Duval drew back, and then suddenly brought all his weight and all his strength to bear against the door, which shook a little beneath the force it was subjected to.

"Ah, it is fast, indeed," said Claude.

The words had hardly escaped his lips when there was a loud report of the discharge of some fire-arms, and he felt a sudden blow which sent him staggering down two or three of the stairs.

"Hit, by Heaven!" he said.

The impression of Duval was fully and clearly that he was hit by a bullet in the breast, and the only wonder that possessed him was that he felt no pain beyond a stunning sensation, and a slight sickness, for the wound had seemed to be just at the region of the stomach.

It was clear that some one was in the chapel waiting for some such an attempt to burst open the door to be made as Claude had made, and then had fired a gun or a pistol through one of its panels.

Claude now staggered down the remainder of the stairs to where his friends were waiting for him, and Turpin said—

"Did you fire, Claude?"

"No—no."

"But we heard a shot, surely."

"Yes, it was at me. I am hit, I think."

"Hit? Don't say that. A light—a light, Jack! Oh, quick! If this be so, Duval, it is the worst chance that has happened to us yet, or that could, by any possibility, happen to us."

Jack eagerly got a light, and when he held it towards Claude they all found that beyond looking rather pale he did not seem so much amiss, and Turpin said to him—

"Where are you hit, Claude? I don't see any blood."

"Nor I," said Jack.

The girls looked as sympathetic as possible, and Mr. Field seemed in a perfect agony of apprehension.

"Upon my life," said Claude Duval, drawing a long breath, "I cannot give you any further information than that a shot was fired through the door, and I felt it hit me; and yet here I am."

"And none the worse?"

"I was the worse, but, strange to say, I am getting better. The bullet, or something very like it, did hit me, for it threw me, by the force of it, actually down several stairs."

"This is quite inexplicable. You are not the sort of man to fancy you are shot, Claude, just because you happen to hear the discharge of a pistol. Where did it hit you?"

"Here," said Duval, as he placed his hand upon his chest. "Ah! what is this? In my waistcoat pocket here is something. Oh, I recollect now. It is a crown piece that I put there some few days ago. Why—why—Look here, Dick. Bring the light a little nearer, Jack."

They both looked eagerly at the crown piece that Claude Duval took from his pocket, and then Dick Turpin said—

"The mystery is solved."

"It is, indeed," said Jack.

"Oh, what is it?" said Alicia.

"It is easily explained," said Claude. "Look at the indentation in this crown piece. You see it is quite shrunk hollow into the form of a cup. The bullet, by good fortune, struck it as it was in my pocket, and gave me the blow that I felt without being able to do me any further mischief."

"Ah, what an escape!" said Alicia.

"It is, indeed."

"Heaven be thanked," said Helen. "I do now, indeed, believe that Heaven is with us in this enterprise, or you, sir, would never have been preserved so miraculously as that."

"It has been a narrow escape, indeed," said Duval, with a smile; "but a miss, as far as a bullet is concerned, is as good as a mile. I don't at all like the state of affairs in the chapel, though, for it is quite clear to me that fire arms are relied upon more than the fastening of the chapel door."

"And that rascal, Dennis," said Mr. Field, "is at the bottom of all this. Oh, if I catch him!"

"Never mind him," said Claude. "It is possible enough that, before this night's affair is over, even Dennis may get his deserts; but, after all, he is only a fool, who is made the dupe of the bolder and wickeder spirit that directs him."

"The abbess?"

"Yes. It is she, and not her poor tool, Dennis, that we now have really to dread."

"But what are we to do?" said the young friend of Alicia's—"oh, what are we to do? You must not again, sir, risk your life by going nearer to that door in the wall of the chapel."

"No, certainly not. But what I propose in the first place is to do the best we can to fasten it on our side."

"Fasten it on our side!" said Jack, in surprise.

"Yes; for it will not be well to give them the chance of stepping down here after us, while we are in the open space beneath the chapel making our arrangements to leave it by some other mode than this, which, no doubt, they are foolish enough to think is about the only one we would think of attempting."

"I see—I see."

"Come, then, Jack, and let us try what we can do in that way. I saw that some of the planking at the foot of the stairs here, that hold up a portion of the wall of the pas[illegible] of the passage, that appears to have at one time fallen, or shown a disposition so to do, were loose. Let us get one of those pieces, and see what we can do with it."

"I understand you," said Jack.

"And so do I," said Dick.

Jack went right to the foot of the stairs, and soon returned with a piece of wood-work of about eight feet in length.

"Will this do?"

"Yes, comfortably," said Claude. "Come along with the light."

Jack lit him to the work he was about, and with great silence and caution, Claude Duval managed to place the plank of wood in such a position from the stairs to the door, that completely wedged up the latter, and any attempt to force it from without would only have the effect of tightening the plank in its place.

"Now," said Duval, "I think that we may take upon ourselves to enter quite fearlessly into the cells, and see what progress we can safely make towards our liberation from this place."

CHAPTER CCCLXVI.

THE CONVENT WELL GIVES UP ONE OF ITS TERRIBLE SECRETS.

THE confident and cheerful manner in which Claude Duval spoke, evidently had the effect of immediately reviving the spirits of the little party.

It was by no means striving at a conclusion to come to the certainty that he had in his own mind some plan of operation which not only rendered the closing of the door leading into the chapel by the abbess and her emissaries of little or no consequence, but rendered the keeping of that door fast since it had once been closed by them an essential thing.

The confidence that Jack and Turpin evidently had in the marvellous resources of Claude Duval, infected the others with the same feeling, and they all looked up to him as the person who was yet to triumph over all the obstacles in the way of deliverance from the vaults and fearful cells, and as the individual who would in time take them to the light of day.

The miraculous way in which Claude had been saved from the consequences of the bullet that had been fired through the door at him, doubtless by the abbess, or by [illegible], contributed largely to the conviction, and to the maintenance of the confidence they all had in him.

Alicia and the two novices could not believe it possible that a man so specially protected by Heaven in what he was about should fail.

And yet, with all this, it was with perceptible shudders that they again sought the dreary abode, which but a short few minutes before they had thought to take their last look at.

Claude saw this feeling in them and he said—

"Courage, ladies—courage. You should consider now, that this is the way to freedom, not to imprisonment. I do not, for a moment, doubt but that soon all will be well."

"You do think," said Alicia, "that you can save us?"

"I do, indeed."

"If any one can, it will be you," said Field. "Recollect that I place myself entirely at your disposal, Mr. Duval, and you have but to order me what to do."

"Come on, then, and fear nothing."

Claude himself led the way, but Jack followed him closely with the little lantern, and so once again they stood beneath the lofty roof of that portion of the gloomy underground region, that was immediately beneath the floor of the convent chapel.

"Here we halt," said Claude.

Without a word the party came to a stand-still; and then Duval, taking the lamp from Jack, said—

"How high do you think the roof is?"

"About thirty feet."

"So I thought, and the upper portion of it is quite lost in obscurity. Dick, look about you, and see if it be possible to find any means of getting a little nearer to the roof, to see of what it is composed."

They all looked about them for that purpose, but it was some time before they found anything to aid them, and then it struck Turpin, that he could accomplish it in a strange sort of way.

"Look you here, Claude," he said, "the walls of this place are supported in several instances by planks of great length, and of tolerable strength; now what is to hinder us from taking two of them, and making a long slanting passage up to the roof, since it is your object to get there?"

"How do you mean, Dick?"

"Why, I would place the two pieces of flat tall timber together at the upper ends, so that they made the shape of the letter A, and then I do think that with a little dexterity one of us may climb up to the top and get sufficiently near to the roof to have a good look at it."

"Good; that will do."

The possibility of this project was one that Claude Duval saw in a moment, and he was anxious that it should as soon as possible be carried out.

To three men such as Duval, Jack, and Turpin, used as they had been to make the greatest exertions, and to the constant exercise of their ingenuity under all sorts of troublesome circumstances, this little project of Dick's for getting to the roof of the place they were in presented no difficulties, provided the materials were at hand.

The long pieces of planking that Dick referred to were evidently of service in keeping some portions of the old wall of the place they were in from bulging forward, but although the removal of them seemed to compromise the safety of the wall, yet they did not suppose that for the short space of time they hoped only to pass in that place that any serious consequences would be likely to arise.

Dick and Jack soon got two planks, each of about twenty feet in length, and they placed them with Claude's assistance in the situation agreed upon.

When so placed it seemed to be quite clear that they reached nearly half way to the roof. By compressing the lower ends into the earth firmly they got the affair tolerably steady, and then Dick said—

"Now, if you, Claude, will hold one of these planks, and you the other, Jack, I will try to get up."

"Excuse me, Dick," said Duval, with a smile, "but you have but one object, I know, in all this, and that is, that we should succeed in what we are about. I am a lighter weight than you are, you know."

"I understand you, Claude. You think you can manage climbing up the planks better than I can, and it is no doubt true, so I will hold one of them for you."

"Besides, Claude is taller when he reaches the top," said Jack.

"He is—he is. Now, Mr. Field, you help us likewise, if you please."

"Yes, with pleasure."

"We will all help," said Alicia. "Can we do nothing to aid you in this matter."

"I think not," said Claude, "except keep out of the way, in case I should come down rather quicker than I go up. Leave us to manage this affair likewise, I beg of you, ladies, and pray get close to yonder wall."

"We obey."

Claude Duval was now satisfied that the girls were in safety, so he took off his boots; and, considering that he would get a firmer hold upon the boards with his stocking soles merely, he commenced the rather perilous ascent.

The angle at which the boards had been put together was rather an acute one; but then, when they placed them end to end in the shape we have described, they felt that the further they drew them apart below, the lower they brought the top of them; and, therefore, they had probably gone to the very extreme in their calculations.

It was with difficulty, but still with certainty, that Claude Duval ascended the slanting boards, and, finally, in the course of about two minutes he was at the top; and then placing his left foot upon the junction of the pieces of wood, he contrived to steady himself pretty well, and to draw himself up to his full height in that rather awkward position.

Duval was pleased to find that they had made a rather wrong estimate of the height of the roof, or of the length of the boards; for, where he stood up, as we have described, he was really within about five or six feet at the utmost of the roof.

"Jack?" said Claude.

"Yes, Claude?"

"Can Mr. Field and Dick spare you while they hold the planks steady, do you think?"

"Yes."

"Then come forward and try if you can throw me up the lantern. I think I can catch it if you will be careful to throw it well and cleverly up to me."

"I will try, Claude."

This was really a hazardous experiment; but everything was so dark and dreary up above that Claude Duval could not see what he went up to see, namely, a something that appeared to be sticking to the ceiling.

Jack took the lantern; and, after calculating the distance he had to throw it, he said—

"Are you ready, Claude?"

"Quite ready. Now for it!"

With more skill than any one would exactly have given Jack credit for possessing, Jack threw up the lantern; and Claude Duval caught it tightly and carefully, without in the slightest degree shifting his position, or making any stir upon the two planks of wood, upon the top of which he stood in so very ticklish a position.

"All right, Claude?"

"Yes, all right, I have it. Now hold steady all of you, for I have something else to attend to."

There was a complete silence now while Claude Duval turned the light of the lantern upon the roof of the place.

That roof was crossed and recrossed by many beams of heavy timber, and to his satisfaction the object that appeared to be fastened to the roof of the he miserable abode was evidently some contrivance for letting people up or down through a trap in the ceiling, that was quite apparent.

The object consisted of a square wooden box, very shallow, but yet with sides sufficient to prevent any one from slipping off it; but how it got down or up was the mystery.

Close to it in the wood-work of the ceiling there were two very large pulleys, and over them passed two ropes, that seemed then to go horizontally a long way across the ceiling; but situated as he was, Claude could not find out where they went to.

Moving the lantern about in all directions, Duval strove all he could to find out the mystery of this curious construction in the roof, but, for a time, it baffled him, despite all the conjectures that came to his mind upon the subject.

CHAPTER CCCLXVII.

FATHER GARVEY APPEARS UPON THE SCENE AGAIN.

The little party, likewise, were rather puzzled to know what Claude Duval could be at, and after a time Dick Turpin said—

"Claude, is there anything amiss?"

"No, Dick, not amiss, but I am a litttle puzzled, that's all. There is some conjuration up here that I don't quite comprehend."

"Danger?" said Jack.

"Oh, no—no. It is some mechanical contrivance for getting up to a trap-door that is here in the roof, and which can lead nowhere but to the chapel."

Upon this information they looked at each other with curiosity, and Jack cried out—

"Why, Claude, if there is a trap-door there it is the very thing for us, I should say."

"Yes, provided we could get through it."

"Hem!" said Turpin, "that certainly is rather an essential consideration, I must confess. What does it look like?"

"A box."

"A box? Why you are joking now, Claude."

"I never was more serious in all my life. But I say, Jack, my friend?"

"Yes, Claude—yes?"

"I want you to catch the lantern again."

"All's right. Throw it now. I have it."

Jack caught the lantern, and then Claude said—

"Now I want you to manage to tie it at the end of as long a stick, or anything else that will hold it as nearly as you can up to the ceiling, as you can contrive."

"I'll do it. We must get the means somehow or another."

"I will tell you where, then," said Mr. Field. "By the side of the stairs leading from the chapel there is a long, narrow, iron rod, partially let into the wall at places. If you can pull it away, it will just do."

"Capital," said Jack. "Ladies and gentlemen, will you have any serious objection to being kept in the dark for a little time?"

"None—none," said Claude. "Go at once, Jack."

Jack did not wait another moment, but started off in search of the iron rod that Mr. Field had spoken of. The little lantern did not, while it was present, seem as if it had given much light; but when it was gone, the gloom—the awful darkness that fell upon the place, and upon every one in it, seemed to be something truly terrific.

It was quite in vain that from his elevated position Claude Duval strove to catch a sight, even dimly, of those below him on the floor of the dismal place.

The probability is, that the alarm of Alicia and her young friends was now much greater than they would have liked those who had so generously encountered so much in their service to know or to suspect; but be that as it may, she and the other two young creatures in the gloomy abode of priestly tyranny did not give utterance to any of the feelings of dread that had taken possession of their hearts.

Claude Duval, though, was about to say something which he intended should be to them of a cheering character—for, although they did not give any expression to their fears, he yet could not help feeling that they must have them—when he was stopped by a singular noise that arose in the place.

They must all have heard it as well as he. It resembled some one at work upon an iron-bar with a file more than anything else, and Claude was puzzled to know what on earth it could possibly proceed from.

THE TERROR-STRICKEN CONFESSOR IN THE DUNGEONS OF THE NUNNERY.

It was Dick who, in a whisper, said to him—

"Do you hear that odd noise, Claude?"

"I do certainly, Dick, and I should feel very much obliged to you, if you could give me any idea of from what it proceeds?"

"Ah, that I cannot."

The noise increased, and then there was a sudden snap, as though something had been broken. After that all was still.

"This won't do," said Dick "we must find out what is going on. Where can Jack be with the light? I hope no harm has come to him."

"No," said Claude. "I can see him, or rather the faint reflection of the light, coming even now."

They were all glad enough to hear this, and in another couple of seconds the flash of the lantern fell upon the roof and walls of the dismal abode, as Jack made his appearance with a long piece of the rough balustrade of the little staircase.

"I have it," said Jack.

"Hush!" said Claude, "we have heard strange sounds since you have been gone."

"Strange sounds?"

"Yes, Jack; and none of us can make out where they come from. It is a puzzle to me."

"Surely it is not that rascally confessor trying to get out of the cell in which you threw him?"

"By Jove, yes!" said Claude. "I never thought of him. You have hit it, Jack. It is Father Garvey, who has sufficiently recovered to make an attempt at escape from the cell. I had quite forgotten that there was such a person in the world."

"Yes," said Dick, "and it strikes me it would have been safer, after all, to have carried out the abbess's kind instructions towards him."

"It would; but we are not capable of such acts, Dick. Neither you nor I are assassins. Father Garvey, though, will keep, if I mistake not, awhile longer. Jack, what scheme have you?"

"You will soon see. What do you think of that?"

Jack had fastened the lantern to the end of the long iron rod that he procured, and succeeded now in hoisting it right up to the roof of the chapel.

"Good. Hold it steady now, Jack."

"Yes, I will."

"Now move along in a line towards the stairs, and go as gently as you can. That's it—that's it. All right—all right. Stop!"

Jack stopped, and as he did so, he came bump against the wall of the place, and down fell the lantern and the iron rod. In a minute all was darkness.

"The deuce take it," said Jack, "I might have been just a little more careful where I was going."

"Never mind," said Claude—"never mind; find the lantern and light it again. I daresay it has come to no sort of harm from its fall."

Jack, after groping about for some distance, found the lantern, and with one of the phosphorus matches he had, he lighted it, but it took some few minutes to burn up, and even then its flame was rather weak and unsteady.

Claude appeared to be upon the point of saying something, when a voice shouted out—

"Now, you wretches, I will bring upon you the vengeance you deserve! He is a dead man who stops me!"

With a sudden rush a figure darted along the place, and not seeing the two boards which were raised up there, came with a crash against them, that knocked them both over, and sent himself rolling to the farther end of the large open space.

All was confusion in a moment. Dick made a dart after the fugitive, and Jack cried out—

"Claude will be killed. He has fallen—he must have fallen."

The girls screamed, and Mr. Field, who had been thrown down with the boards, looked thoroughly bewildered.

"The light, Jack!" said Duval, in a calm, clear voice, as though nothing were the matter. "Silence, ladies—silence, if you please. There is nothing gained by screaming."

It is truly extraordinary how the presence of mind of one person will have an effect upon the feelings and the actions of many, and induce calmness instead of agitation. The manner in which Claude spoke, while it let everybody know that he was not hurt by the fearful fall that they all made quite sure he must have had, likewise convinced them that he saw what to do.

With a bound he reached that portion of the subterranean abode to which the figure that had made the sudden rush had rolled, and before Father Garvey, for it was indeed he, could struggle half way to his feet, Claude had him by the throat quite securely.

"Now, Jack, the light."

"Yes, Claude."

Jack, and, indeed, the whole party, now made their way up to the spot where the confessor was writhing in the grasp of Duval. The confessor's face was pale as death itself, save a streak of blood that oozed from a wound in his forehead, that he had received from the blow he had struck himself against the edge of one of the planks. His vestments were torn, and he was covered with fragments of the damp straw that was in the cell where Claude Duval had left him, as he thought, in a tolerable state of security and repose.

"Unhand me, villain!" said Father Garvey—"unhand me, I say, or you shall rue the day you looked upon me!"

"No, master confessor," said Claude, "I won't unhand you; and as for rueing, I rather think that is what will be your fate."

The priest was half mad evidently, for, despite the powerful grip that Claude Duval had of him, and despite the numbers he saw around him, he began to kick and plunge, and bite and scratch, in such a wild sort of way, that Claude was compelled to say—

"Dick, be so good as to tie this gentleman's legs together, and his hands behind his back."

Dick made a dart at the legs of the reverend father, and soon tied them firmly together: Jack did the same by his hands, and then Claude let him go; and he rolled upon the floor, and cursed and swore in a way that none but a priest could curse and swear.

"You may amuse yourself, holy sir, at that kind of fun as long as you like," said Claude; "it don't affect us in the least; only mark me, if you make too much noise it will be necessary to put a stop to it."

This significant hint was not lost upon Father Garvey, and he lay partly in a state of exhaustion, and partly in a state of prudential stillness, only that he glared at Claude Duval as if he would have eaten him, had he the power so to do.

The alarm of the young girls was by no means decreased by all this; and it was found that the youngest of the novices had fainted.

CHAPTER CCCLXVIII.

THE ABBESS TRIES A NEW PLAN OF OPERATIONS AGAINST THE INTRUDERS.

"Oh, help! help!" said Alicia; "I do think that Helen is dead! Oh, bring the light here!"

Upon this cry they speedily brought the light to the spot, and then sure enough they found that the young creature was completely insensible, and hanging upon the arm of Alicia.

"She is not dead," said Duval; "she has fainted. But we must not let her remain in that state, as in the bad air of this place it is impossible to say what catastrophe might not ensue.

"How are we to recover her?" said Field. "What are we to do, Alicia, to restore her?"

"We want water," said Alicia. "Cold water would, no doubt, bring her to herself again."

"I'm afraid that is not to be had here."

"There is a well," said Jack, "close at hand. I cast a stone into it as I came along, and there was a distinct splash of water consequent upon its fall. Surely there is some mode of getting up some of the water; and if so, I will warrant its being cold enough."

"Go and see," said Claude—"go and see what you can do, Jack. Here, Miss Alicia, let the young creature lie down. She is not very heavy, I daresay; but she is still too heavy for you to support for a length of time."

As he spoke, Claude slipped off his coat and spread it upon the ground for the young girl to lie upon. Alicia thanked him by a look which expressed much more than words could say upon the subject, and then she knelt upon the coat and supported the head of the novice upon her lap, which was certainly much easier than holding her up, as she had been doing.

"I will go and help Jack to get the water from the well," said Claude. "There is no danger, and Mr. Field will stay with you, and we shall hear if you want anything."

Both Jack and Dick Turpin had gone to the well to see what could be done in the way of getting up some cold water for the use of the fainting novice, and when Claude arrived they were slowly hauling up a bucket that they had found there, and which they had attached to a rope that they found, but of the strength of which they had rather serious doubts.

"The water is a long way down," said Jack, "but we have got some, I can tell by the weight."

"Pull slowly and quietly," said Dick.

The bucket came up to the surface, and then Claude stretched out his hand and got hold of it.

"All's right," he said, "I have it."

He drew it towards him, and then in rather an odd voice, he said—

"The light, Jack."

Jack picked up the lantern from the floor and held it over the bucket, and then they all three looked in silent horror at what it disclosed to them.

Floating in the water they had got up from the well was a portion of an infant's hand and arm, and a large piece of a skull with hair still upon it. The water itself had a shiny, oily look, and upon its surface floated fatty globules, and what appeared to be pieces of half decomposed flesh.

"Horrible!" said Claude.

Jack turned aside sick and faint at the sight.

"Good God!" said Dick.

Duval held the bucket over the brink of the well, and let go of it. Far down with a sullen kind of splash it reached the water, and then all was still.

The three friends looked at each other now for several moments in silence, and then Claude said in a whisper—

"We must not tell this to the ladies. It will kill them with terror. Surely now we must believe to the utmost in all the horrors that are recorded of convent criminality. This well seems to be the receptacle of the bodies of infants."

"Yes, infants born in the convent," said Jack. "There can be no doubt of it. Of course, they must be disposed of somehow or another."

"That is true," said Dick; "and if any one tells me that a score or two of idle, well-fed women come to such an abode as this, and leave their passions at the gates, and turn saints when they enter a convent, I shall have no hesitation in saying that it is a lie."

"This is truly sickening," said Claude.

"I am quite faint," said Jack.

"Come away from the brink of the well," said Dick. "I fancy, now, that horrible and noisome odours arise from it. We shall be poisoned if we remain any longer close to it. But, amid other mysteries, and stranger things, Claude Duval, there is one which we want an explanation of from you, and that is, how you came so neatly to the floor when the planks were knocked from under you without doing yourself any apparent injury whatever?"

"Yes; that," said Jack, "is, indeed, a mystery to me."

"It is one that I can easily explain," said Claude. "I came down quite easily and comfortably; for when the boards went from under me, I had hold of something else."

"Something else! What else?"

"Listen. While I was up there looking at the roof, I saw that there was some mode of reaching this place by means of a kind of basket or box, that was secured under a trap-door opening from the chapel. I could not see how it was made to act, till you, Jack, held up the lantern by the aid of the iron rod, and then I perceived that there were two ropes over two pulleys going in the direction you intended when you ran against the wall, and two in the other direction. As you went, I saw that at the end of the roof there were two other pulleys, and that the ropes went over them; so I came to the conclusion at once that there must be some counterpoise to any weight upon the descending platform or box. At the moment that the pieces of planking were knocked from under me, I clutched at the lower part of that box, and down I came quite easily and rapidly, with it in my grasp."

"I see," said Jack.

"And so do I," said Dick. "When you left go of it, up it went again, I suppose?"

"It did."

"Then, we are saved!"

"I hope so. I suppose that the abbess knows of this little mechanical arrangement; but, no doubt, she considers the idea of our getting to the roof of the place as quite out of the question, and so don't trouble herself about that part of the matter at all."

"That is it, you may depend; but her ladyship don't exactly know the sort of people she has got to deal with. What would be a difficulty to many, is none to us, or, at all events, it is one that can be easily got over. Let us see how our young friend the novice is."

When they got back to where Mr. Field was staying with the young girls, they just said that they had been unsuccessful in getting some water from the well, and Dick proposed just wetting the lips of the fainting girl with a little brandy of which he had a flask full in his pocket.

In the absence of any other means of trying to recover her, they were perforce compelled to adopt that, and the effect so far justified it, that in a few moments she began to breathe, and to open her eyes.

"Oh, save me—save me!" she cried. "I have done nothing to deserve this cruel treatment."

"Be calm," said Alicia, "you are with friends."

"Oh, no—no. Do not—oh, holy lady abbess, I cannot bear it—indeed, I cannot. Do not subject me to this really fearful punishment."

"She raves," said Alicia. "Alas! poor girl."

"I will promise," added the young creature, "to tell of nothing that I have seen or heard here. I will swear it, and, indeed, and in truth, you may rely upon my oath, for I have not yet seen enough of the wickedness of this place, to be callous to an oath."

"Listen to me," said Alicia. "Do you not know me?"

"Yes—yes, you will obey the orders of the abbess."

"No—no. Indeed I will not."

"And you will punish me. I know that you are all preparing so to do. I shall be stretched upon that dreadful machine, and my hands and feet tied, and then I shall be cruelly beaten. Oh, do not, I implore you! The pain—the agony is great!"

The affected young girl burst into tears.

"She will recover now," said Alicia.

"This is enough to melt a heart of stone," said Field. "Does she allude to punishments that the abbess inflicts upon the novices?"

"Yes," said Alicia. "I cannot describe them to you, but the abbess and some of the older nuns take a delight in inflicting pain upon the novices, and that is what fills the imagination of our poor young friend with such terrors."

The tears of the novice seemed to wash away the cloud that had been before her perceptions, and she was able to comprehend where she was, and to feel that there was no danger.

So blissful a state of things made a wonderful change in her aspect, and half laughing and half crying, she clung to Alicia, and implored Heaven to bless those who were doing so much to save her from misery, pain, and degradation.

"Hush!" said Jack suddenly, as he laid his hand upon the arm of Claude Duval. "What is that?"

"What? what? Ah! Let us listen."

Some sound now like the tapping of some pieces of metal against each other evidently came from the chapel above. At first Claude thought that it was from the part of the roof were was the trap door; but he soon traced the sound to quite another part of the ceiling. It ceased, though, before they could come to any conclusion as to what it was, or what it portended.

"This place," said Turpin, "is as full of mysteries as of dangers. Come, now, Claude, do you think that it will be safe to try the assent to the chapel by the trap door?"

"Safe or not safe, we will do it; but before we commence operations, tell me, Alicia, do you think that there is any possibility of another prisoner being in the cells?"

"Alas, I know not, but I would gladly urge you to search them all before leaving."

"It is a duty. Come you with me, Jack, and we will go together. We will make our search as rapidly as we can, and lose no time."

CHAPTER CCCLXIX.

THE SECRETS OF THE CELLS APPAL JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL.

THERE was, in reality, no time lost in the search of the cells that Claude and Jack now undertook, for Claude wished to acquaint his friend exactly with the mode of operation that he thought would answer with the cords and the pulleys connected with the trap-door in the roof.

One thing in connection with that trap-door was quite clear, and that was—that the principle of its construction was such that it had been only intended for the purpose of facilitating the descent of any one from the chapel, and not the ascent of any one from the gloomy region below.

It required a weight in the square box attached to the ropes to overcome the weights that no doubt would be found attached to the ends of them; but when the box reached the ground, and the unhappy object either fell or got out of it, then it would ascend again, because the weights became the heavier.

When it had ascended it was quite clear, that unless the chapel door was to be found, and along with finding it the means of opening it were found, the victims must soon perish in the vaults from starvation, if from no other cause.

The problem, then, that Jack and Claude and Dick had to solve in connection with the trap-door and its appendages was, to make it useful as a means of ascent as well as descent, and that was rather difficult.

Before deciding upon what mode of immediate operation they could bring to bear upon that subject, they proceeded to the cells one after the other.

The only fear they had was lest there should be some of the cells in a secret situation which their time would not allow them just then to look for; but, still, they must do something, if they could not do all they wished, and so they dashed open the door of the first cell they came to.

It was empty.

"That is a relief," said Jack. "Now for this one! Ah! look—look, Claude!"

"What is it?"

"Some one is there. We come to save you, be you whom you may; for your presence in one of these cells is sufficient proof that you are an enemy to the abbess of the convent."

No answer was returned to this speech of Jack's, and yet they could both of them see pretty plainly that there was something like a human being at the farther end of the cell.

"Give me the light," said Claude; and, taking it from Jack, he advanced right into the cell. It did not take him more than two steps to get to the farther end of it; and then the sight that he saw made him quickly recoil again.

Fastened by the waist to the wall by a short chain that did not permit it to fall to the floor was the dead body of a nun. The convent costume still clung to the faded skeleton form; but the flesh had dropped from the face, leaving the hideous, yellow, discoloured bones plainly perceptible.

"Horrible! horrible!" said Claude.

"What is it?"

"Take the light and look for yourself. I cannot give you any description of the sight."

One glance was quite enough for Jack; and, without a word, he turned from the loathsome spectacle, and shut the cell door.

In no other cell but one more did they find anything that was so fearful to look upon; and in that they saw the body of a man lying upon its face. A number of loathsome flies, of immense size, were feasting upon the remains of that unhappy human being, who, no doubt, had been decoyed into the convent by the abbess, and then safely disposed of, for some reason or another, in that house of death.

"There are no more cells," said Jack. "Let us return to our friends now, Claude; and they may, in truth, when we tell them what we have seen, congratulate themselves upon escaping the duty we have been upon."

"They may, indeed, Jack."

Claude Duval and Jack now returned to the party they had left, not far from the spot above which was the trap-door in the floor of the chapel. Without describing what he had seen, Claude satisfied himself by saying, that there was no other human being alive but themselves in the place.

"And now, Dick and Jack, you both help me, and I think I have found a mode of getting the square box down here."

"Yes," said Dick, "that may be; but to get it up again with a weight in it is the difficulty."

"Which we must meet by adding weight to the other end of the ropes. But let us get it down first. I expect that but a small force is requisite for that purpose. Where is the iron rail, Jack, with which you elevated the lantern so cleverly?"

"It is here."

The iron rail was very much rusted indeed; but Claude Duval used it very tenderly, and after snapping off a piece of about six inches at the end, he found the rest of it in not so bad a condition, and that it would bear being bent into a hook at the end.

"Now," he said, "if I can catch hold of the lower part or the rim of the strange kind of tray that is up there under the trap-door, down it will come."

With great care Claude elevated the iron rod, and got a hold of the platform; and as he had surmised, it required but very little force, indeed, to bring it down to the floor. The weights attached to the ends of the ropes evidently did not much more than overbalance it, and cause it to ascend, when no force was used to keep it down.

"Here we are," said Claude.

"Ha!—ha!" laughed a hideous voice. "Lost!—lost!—lost! Make your peace with offended Heaven, ye Philistines, for you surely die now! Ha! —ha!"

"The devil!" said Claude.

Jack turned so sharply round at the sound of this terrible voice, which appeared to fill the whole place, that he struck the lantern against Dick Turpin, and knocked the light out; but all was not darkness in the gloomy vault. Not far from the roof, and close above the spot where they had heard the mysterious metallic tapping a short time since, they saw a strange dubious sort of light; but what it was, or where it came from, was a mystery that they saw no means just then of solving. Now and then a spark from the strange light would dart out of the mass of it and fall to the floor, generally going out before it reached it; and then some of the light seemed to be making an odd, crackling kind of noise, that could not by the adventurers in the vault be at all accounted for in any reasonable way.

"Never mind," said Claude Duval, "it is very kind of the abbess to provide us with a light. We shall see all the better what we are about now."

"Much better," said Mr. Field.

"So we shall," said Dick.

"Yes," said Jack, rather dubiously; "but I doubt whether upon the whole we shall find it any advantage."

"Never mind. You, Jack, go to one of the ropes that hang down the wall with the weights at the end of them, and you, Dick, go to another on the other side. It appears to me that, with very little trouble, you will be able to haul me up to the ceiling. The united leverage caused by two men using their utmost exertion would be sufficient to hoist me much higher than the chapel-floor, therefore it will be a comparatively easy task for the three of you to raise me, and it will not require much force to keep me there when I once touch the roof."

"We may do that," said Jack.

They saw at once how this could be done, and without another word departed to do it. They found that, pulling in unison, Claude and the little box began to go up—up—up gradually to the roof, and that they could maintain his position there without any serious difficulty at all.

It was no part of Duval's system to delay when nothing was to be got by it, and he set to work upon the trap-door in the roof in earnest. It was fastened on the outer side; but by the aid of a powerful small crow-bar, with a very sharp edge to it, Claude soon lifted it, and pushed it on one side. He was rather surprised that all seemed as dark now as it had been before, and that he found no change of atmosphere above the trap-door, which, to all appearance, opened into the chapel.

Duval put up his hand as high as he could reach, and found no obstruction, so that he felt satisfied he must be in the chapel, and yet there was something very strange about the fact that it should be so completely deserted and silent as it was.

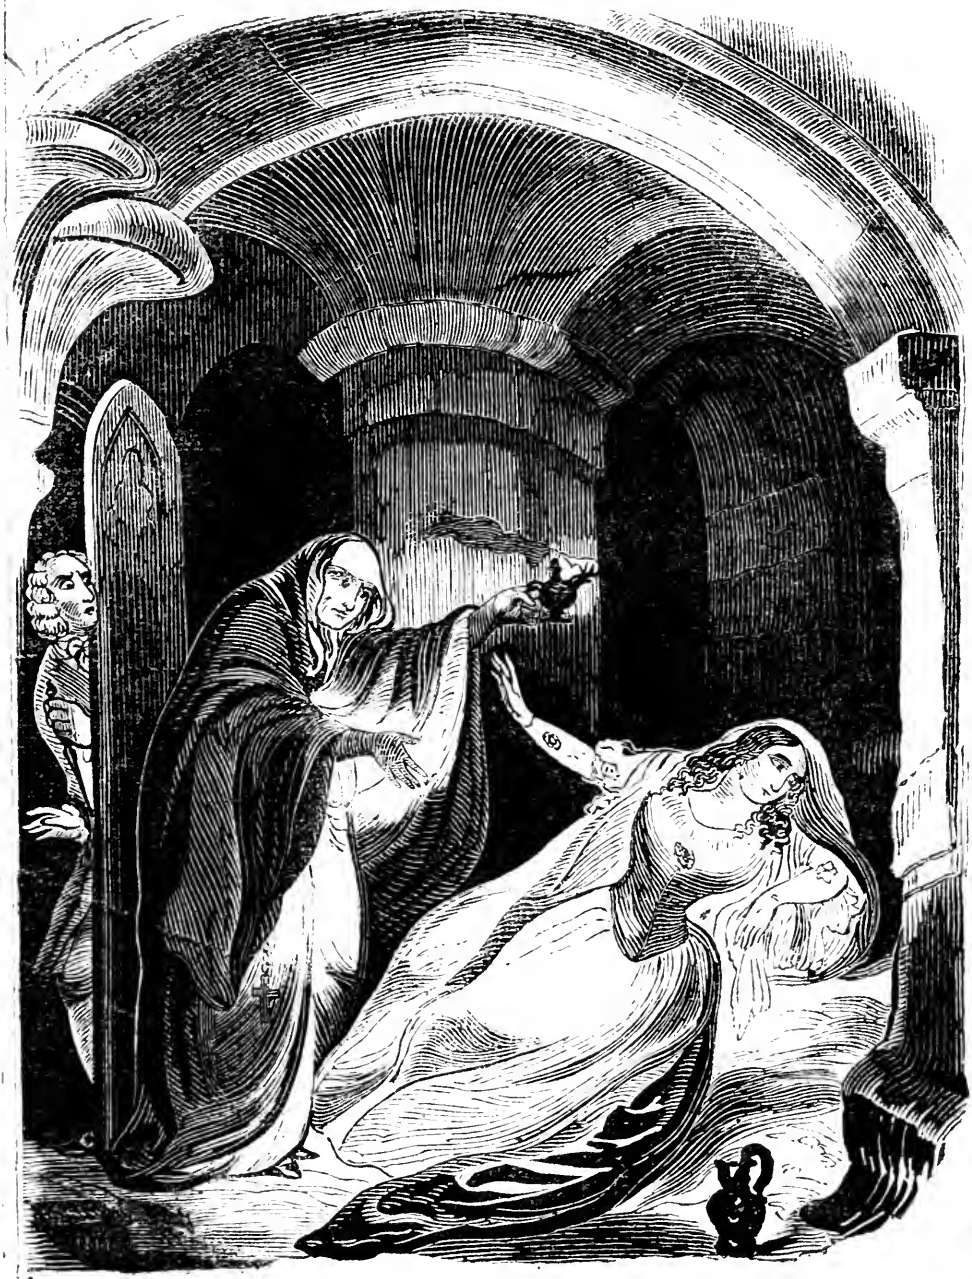
"Claude—Claude!" called Dick.

"Yes, Dick?"

"Is all right there?"

"Well—I—hope so. It's rather confusing."

"Come down, Claude—come down!"



"Ascertain, if you can, what the obstruction is, before you come down."

"Oh, God! what is it?" said Alicia. "We shall all die!"

"No—no, it will go off," said Mr. Field. "It cannot hurt; and yet it is strange."

"What on earth are you all talking about?" said Claude, as he strove to look clearly down into the vaulted place.

"There's a suffocating vapour here," said Turpin, "that is half choking us all, and we don't know what to make of it. Don't you feel any of it up there Claude ?"

"No."

"Nor smell anything ?"

"Certainly not. The air don't seem to be amiss up here at all. What can you be dreaming about?"

"It is no dream, Claude Duval. The mysterious light yonder near to the middle of the roof is some process by which some deleterious kind of gas is evolved, which must be heavier than the atmospheric air, and so sinks, which is the reason you don't smell it where you are; but I can tell you, old fellow, that we can't live in it long."

"Let me down at once. Let go of the ropes. Let me down. By Heaven! I fancied something of the sort."

They were unwilling enough, as may be supposed, to involve Claude Duval in the same disagreeable state of things that oppressed them in that wretched place; but as it was impossible that he could have any correct notion of the state of the atmosphere below in the situation he was in, they gradually relaxed the ropes, and let him safely descend to the level of the floor of the huge cavernous place again.

It was a great object though, now, not to allow the movable piece of platform to go up to the roof again, which it, of course, would have done the moment it got free from the weight of Claude Duval; so he said to Jack—

"Stand upon this, Jack. What we have to say, we may say just as well with your weight here as otherwise."

Jack stood upon the platform at once, and that sufficed to keep it down, and then as Claude Duval stepped off it to the ground, there came a gush of the noxious vapour, with which the place was filling, right across his mouth, and he staggered and nearly fell beneath its deadly influence.

CHAPTTER CCCLXX.

THE DANGERS OF CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS INCREASE, AND FATHER GARVEY TRIUMPHS EXCEEDINGLY.

"By Heavens!" said Claude Duval, "it is the intention of that hag of an abbess to smother us."

"Very like it, indeed," said Turpin. "Only I for one beg to decline the operation."

"But what are we to do?" said Jack.

"Make a bold attempt at once at the door leading to the chapel," cried Turpin. "I won't stay here and be gradually choked any longer, for that is the sort of operation that I feel is now going on with us."

As he spoke, Dick Turpin began to make his way out of the place, in the direction of the passage leading to the flight of steps, above which was that door which there was every rational reason to believe was well guarded by the lady abbess and her emissaries.

"Hold!" said Claude."

"Yes, to my life I will," said Dick Turpin.

"Nay, hear me."

"Go on, then. What have you to say that is better than such a mode of operation?"

"Much."

"Out with it then, Claude."

"There is, of course, a route to the chapel by the platform. I propose that by such means we reach it, and not by the door. There can be no doubt at all but that we are expected to make an attack upon the door, rather than stay here to be suffocated, and do you think, for a moment, that with such an expectation, a woman of the foreseeing and cunning disposition of the lady abbess would leave that door unguarded? No, you may depend that it would be certain destruction to some of us to go to that door, and those who might be destroyed might be those, who, as men, we should most lament."

As Claude Duval spoke, he glanced at the helpless females who were with them, and Dick Turpin felt the effect in all its force.

"You are right, Claude. By Jove, you are right."

"I knew you would say so."

"Yes; if we were only men here, I should say let us go by the door; but now, I bethink me, we have others to look to. Have the matter all your own way; but in the name of all that's delightful, let us have a mouthful of fresh air as soon as possible."

"I faint," said one of the novices.

"No—no! Don't," cried Jack. "There is no time, I assure you, my good girl. We are not in circumstances to allow you to faint."

Claude could scarcely forbear a smile at this odd mode of addressing the novice that Jack adopted; but he, too, felt that there was no time to lose, so he said—

"Now draw me up again. I see what has to be done, and done it shall be quickly. Do not ask me any questions; but do as I ask you, and I will pledge my word to save you all."

Both Jack and Turpin had quite confidence sufficient in the courage and in the extraordinary tact of Claude Duval in adopting the best possible mode of getting clear of any set of adverse circumstances to obey his orders when he gave them with such confidence; so they proceeded at once to the ropes again, after he had placed himself upon the movable platform.

It did not take many minutes to raise Claude right up to the roof again, and then he commenced operations with alacrity.

Upon the former occasion when he had been up that height he had felt that his hand and arm passed up into a hollow space, which ought to have been the chapel itself, since it was beyond the roof, but which yet could not be it, since the darkness was intense, and there was not fresh air enough to lead to the supposition that such was the case.

This was a little puzzling, to be sure; but the state of affairs below were of such a character that it would not do to stop and consider about what was to be done.

Promptitude of action now was really everything.

It will be recollected that Father Garvey had been tied neck and heels by Jack and Turpin; so that he lay upon the floor of the place totally harmless, and now and then, when his passion get the better of his prudence, uttering vehement expressions of anger, and sending those who had got thus the better of him to the full enjoyment of all those pains and penalties of another life which persons of most, if not of all denominations know so perfectly well how to make the most of.

Of course, neither Claude nor his friends troubled themselves not one jot about the denunciations of Father Garvey, so long as he did not make so much noise as to disturb them, and that he did not certainly do, for even in the midst of his rage he did not forget that—

"Discretion is the better part of valour."

The two young novices seemed to be more deeply affected by the terrible suffocating vapour that the lady abbess had succeeded in calling to her aid against her foes than any of the party.

As for Claude, the higher he got up from the floor of the gloomy and death-dealing region the more free he felt himself from the vapour, so that it was quite evident it was one of those deleterious gases which are heavier than atmospheric air, and so descend through it.

That the abbess should use such a vapour as that showed the extreme art of the woman, for if it had been of a more volatile tendency it would, of course, have had the likely effect of filling the chapel and the whole convent with its death-dealing fumes; but as it was, it just was doing the duty she intended of it and no more,

With the crowbar in his hand—the same crowbar that had enabled him to knock away the portion of the roof of the subterranean place that was immediately above the movable box or platform, call it which you will—Claude now tried to work upon what further obstacles there were that stopped his way to the chapel.

With the crowbar, though, in his hand he found he could only just reach to the roof of the sort of building that was over the orifice leading to the vaults, and for the life of him he could not make out what it was.

While he was thus trying, without much effect, his skill to get out of the place, Jack called up to him—

"Claude—Claude?"

"Yes, Jack?"

"We can't live here any longer. We are dying. The poisonous vapour is taking possession of our senses."

"Don't say that."

"Alas—alas! it is true. Farewell—farewell, Claude. Provide for your own safety, if you can, and don't heed us."

"Is Father Garvey dead? I hear no complaints from him."

"I don't know. He lies upon his back, too, and ought to be getting the most of the vapour. I daresay he is no more."

"Stop a bit," cried Dick Turpin—"stop a bit; I have found out how the holy father manages. He is all alive and well, for he is tying, now, a handkerchief over his mouth and nose, that he has had tied in one direction for some time; he is only now shifting it to a fresh part of the handkerchief. Let us do the same and we are safe, if he is so."

"Try it at once," cried Claude, "for the love of heaven!"

The hope that this might be a means of saving them from the worst effects of the deleterious air that was evolved from the substance in the brazier that had been let a little way down from the chapel into the vaults assailed them all for a moment or two with new vigour.

They luckily found that one of the novices had a dress of rather closely woven muslin, which was just the thing: so, with her full and free consent, they tore it up into long pieces, and each of them tied a portion round their mouth and nose, so that the air that they admitted to their lungs was, in good truth, thoroughly and completely filtered by passing through the several folds of the muslin.

Now, it is quite a well understood fact, and one which it is as well that every one should know, that air may be filtered quite as easily as water, because in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred what is with the air and vitiates it is of a much more material character than the real air itself, and will be arrested by an obstruction that allows the pure air to pass.

This is precisely the principle upon which nature, in a common filter made of gravel and charcoal, permits only pure and limpid water to pass through it, and keeps back all grosser particles of matter.

The effect, then, of what we may truly call these muslin filters of air upon the half-fainting occupants of the vaults of the convent was great, indeed. In the course of a few moments the feeling of lassitude that was so like death, and which in a short time would have passed into that state, wore off, and the blood once more freely circulated in their veins.

"Oh, this is Heaven in comparison with our former state!" said Alicia.

"It is—it is!" cried the novices.

"Upon my life," said Dick, "it is delightful! We do not value simple delights till we have been deprived of them for a time. I never could have believed that to draw a long breath without the feeling that you were half-choked by the process was such a truly delightful feeling as it is."

"Nor I," said Jack. "But we must let Claude know that all is well with us now, and that we can wait a little."

"Do so."

"Claude?" called Jack—"Claude?"

"Yes, Jack? How are you all now?"

"Much better."

"I am so glad to hear it!"

"Yes, we can wait now; so, don't do anything precipitous that may be done better and more effectually by taking your time about it."

"All's right! I am working away! Ah! what's that?"

"You abominable wretches!" said the deep, hollow, sepulchral kind of voice that had before sounded in the place, and which evidently came from somewhere contiguous to it. "You abominable, vile, and sacrilegious wretches! Already must you be in the pangs of that dissolution, which will only be the precursor of the still greater torments that you will suffer in the world which is to come! Death is your portion!"

The voice ceased.

"Don't reply," said Claude. "It is quite as well that the very amiable individual who thus spoke should think that we are suffering all the pangs she or he supposes, as then it will not seem necessary to adopt any other means of quickly and comfortably disposing of us."

Acting upon this hint, they were all quite still in the vaults. But Father Garvey, having his wits about him, and from the first not having suffered from the deleterious vapour, the nature of which he understood, no doubt, quite well, called out in loud accents—

"No—no! They will escape! They will escape!"

"Stop his mouth!" said Claude.

The most prompt and effectual way that struck Jack of stopping the mouth of the father-confessor was to thrust something into it, so he made up to him, and, despite his resistance, crammed the handkerchief the reverend confessor had been holding directly to his mouth and nose right into the former, so that while it still acted as a filter to him for the foul air, he could not shut his mouth at all, nor utter a word.

It was found, too, that Father Garvey had got one of his hands at liberty, and that Jack took good care to secure again.

"Now, master father-confessor," said Jack, "I rather think that you are in about as helpless a condition as you very well can be in. Don't kick, for if you do, you will only draw a little tighter the cord that holds your legs together. Don't struggle with your hands, for if you do you will have a good chance of dislocating your shoulders. Don't try to bawl out, for if you do you will infallibly choke yourself."

All these troubles come so home to the mind of the father-confessor, that he did not attempt to commit any one of the imprudent acts that Jack portended, but only lay upon his back goggling his eyes, and looking as though the last threatened catastrophe, namely, the choking one, was much nearer at hand than Jack intended, or his reverence would wish for.

CHAPTER CCCLXXI.

THE MYSTERY OF THE ORIFICE IN THE ROOF IS EXPLAINED.

WHILE all this was going on below, Claude was far from being idle upon his rather exalted perch above.

Finding that all was for the present safe, comparatively speaking, at all events, with his friends upon the floor of the vault, Duval took his work much more deliberately, for he felt quite sure that nothing was to be gained by percipitancy, while everything was to be lost.

He was satisfied that the roof over the orifice in the chapel floor was of a rectangular form, and to give a very familiar description of it, it seemed after Claude had got away the lower part of it, to be something like a very large chest reversed, and placed over the hole in the floor of the chapel leading to the vaults.

With this impression, then, of the shape of the obstacle that was in the way of his reaching the chapel, Claude Duval felt, with care and gentleness, for what might be called the sides of the reversed chest, and he soon felt them, just situated as might be expected.

One of these sides presented a firm resistance to the pressure of the crowbar; but to his great surprise, the other yielded before it in a moment, and, indeed, it did so with such readiness, that Claude Duval very nearly fell from the platform owing to not finding the resistance he expected.

It was, indeed, a fortunate thing for him that he was tolerably well upon his guard, or he must have had rather a severe tumble.

Upon finding, then, that this side, as it were, of the square chest over the opening in the roof of the vaulted place and the floor of the chapel gave way on one side, Claude carefully examined the how and the why it so gave way, and he was not long in satisfying himself that he knew all about it.

That side he found to be about four feet in height, and it was evidently hinged on to the upper or flat portion of the chest by those description of hinges which would go both ways, according as any force was applied to the flap or door with which they were connected.

"Good, so far," cried Claude to himself, and then raising his body up by a rather powerful effort, he found that there would be no difficulty in crawling through that hinged piece of wood, and on the instant he did so, his hands fell upon the cold marble floor of the chapel.

The air, too, was cool and refreshing, and, in comparison with the darkness of the place immediately below him, the chapel was quite light.

Several candles, that burnt day and night before an image of the Virgin, that was in a nick about the centre of the principal aisle of the chapel, shed their light through the whole space, which, to Claude Duval, presented so great a contrast to the darkness from whence he had issued.

One steady glance around him, now, made him familiar with all that had seemed to be so full of perplexity and mystery.

The chest-like construction, which had so puzzled him from below, was nothing more nor less in appearance, when you viewed it from the chapel, than a tomb, apparently of stone, with the effigy of some highly-sanctified individual reposing at full length upon the top of it. The top and one of the sides and the two ends were of stone, but the flap or door-way, if it might be called such, through which Claude Duval came into the chapel, was of wood, painted very finely to look just like the rest of the construction.

In lieu of a tomb, then the whole affair was but a blind, to cover up that mode of descent to the vaults below.

The comprehension of the whole affair was quite easy.

If any one got upon the floor, and chose to roll against the wooden door at the side of the seeming tomb, it would, on account of opening either way upon its well-hung hinges, give way with them, and they would come upon the piece of wood-work in the roof, which Duval had before displaced with the crowbar, and which was hinged so as to open downwards, and to close again by a spring. Through, or rather past that they would go, and so on to the descending platform, which with their weight would go plump at once to the floor of the vault, and then the job was done.

The person would either roll out in the progress of the fall, or be jerked out upon reaching the floor, or immediately get out, and in either case up would go the platform again, in consequence of the counterpoise weights acting upon it, and the whole apparatus would be quite ready for the use of any one else who might choose to go down, or who might be forced down, not choosing it at all.

In working away the lower piece of wood-work, Claude Duval had found that there was some iron-work in his way, and now he quite understood what it had been.

"So," he said to himself in a whisper, "I have now come at the secret mode by which any victim might at a few moments' notice be spirited, as it were, away from the chapel, and no one know whither they had gone, except those entrusted with the fearful secret of this seeming tomb."

That the abbess, or some one in her interests, might be in the chapel, was a proposition so very likely to be true, that Claude was prudently careful not only not to utter a sound that might betray his presence, but likewise not to let his head be seen above the level of the edge of the mock tomb.

That such caution was very much called for under the circumstances, very quickly became apparent enough; for as Claude was just, with all the care possible, projecting the top of his forehead high enough above the tomb to let his eyes get clear of the rim of it, there came a sudden flash of light over the chapel, and he heard a voice, which he knew at once as that of the lady abbess, say—

"Dennis—Dennis!"

There was no reply.

"Dennis—Dennis!" she said again, in rather louder tones; and then, in a half sleepy tone, Dennis replied—

"An' faith, sir, it's meself that will be the faithful servant, and follow you, sir, through fire and water, sir, an' please you."

"Dennis, I say! You dream."

"Eh? Oh, dear!"

"Fool! awake."

"Yes. Bedad, my lady abbess, and it was dreaming I was, surely. I thought I was talking to the master, you see, ma'am, that's all; but, bedad, it's meself that knows where I am now all among the saints, any how."

"Silence!"

"Yes, ma'am, if you please, ma'am."

There was now a pause of a few minutes' duration, after which the lady abbess said, in a low and anxious tone—

"It is strange—very strange, indeed."

"Yes, ma'am, it is."

"Hold your tongue, idiot!"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Do not presume to speak, except in reply to me."

"No, ma'am."

"I placed you here to watch, did I not?"

"Faith, then, ma'am, you never said a truer thing than that, any how."

"And instead of watching, you fell asleep?"

"Asleep, ma'am?"

"Yes, asleep."

"Is it asleep, ma'am, you say? Oh, bedad, then, that's a mighty great mistake, my lady, any way. It was only thinking I was, my lady; but it isn't the likes of me that would go to sleep in this a-place, my lady, more by token that you tould me to watch and listen; and how could I do them same things if I was to be going off to sleep, my lady?"

"That is just what I should like to know," said the abbess. "If you have not slept you have watched; if you have watched you have heard something, for it is not in reason that all this time should pass and no sound indicative of death coming from those below."

"Certainly not, ma'am, as you say, it isn't in reason."

"What have you heard, then?"

"What have I heard, is it?"

"Yes, fellow."

"Why, ma'am, infidels and heathens like them as is below in the cellar, ma'am, is not to be accounted for any way."

"Then you heard nothing, and so I know that you slept upon your post."

"Slept on a post, ma'am?"

"Fool! You slept here in the chapel instead of watching and listening as I told you to do to the slightest sound that might disturb its stillness."

"Oh, no, ma'am."

"Now, I tell you that you did. Do not provoke me, or your life is not worth a moment's purchase, and you die, too, without absolution."

"Don't be after saying that, ma'am, and threatening a poor fellow with the going out of the world without the clergy, ma'am. I will tell you all I heard ma'am, which was a shrieking and a groaning."

"Ah! A shrieking and a groaning?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"That is music to me to hear of."

"Yes, ma'am, and after a while, you see, ma'am, there was a knocking and a rumbling, as though the ould gentleman himself was coming; and then, after that, ma'am, everything went quiet and aisy, and nothing woke me up—I mean, nothing disturbed me, as I sat here thinking of ould Ireland."

"They are dead, then?"

"I should say uncommonly dead, ma'am."

"My vengeance is complete. Ha—ha—ha!"

"Ha—ha!" laughed Dennis. "Mighty droll it is, any way. Her ladyship's vengeance is complete. Ha—ha!"

"Silence, idiot!"

The tone in which this command was given pretty clearly let even Dennis know that he went upon rather dangerous ground when he presumed to laugh at the same time and at the same thing as the lady abbess did. He was silent on the moment.

The abbess, then, lifted the lamp she carried from a stand on which she had placed it, and approached the door in the wall of the chapel, and placed her ear to it and listened.

"All is still as the grave," she said.

"Yes, ma'am," said Dennis.

"Peace! Yes, all is still as the grave; and why not? for it is a grave to them. They are surely all dead now, and I have my revenge upon them all. Well, that is something. I must write to the sovereign pontiff to appoint a new confessor to the convent, since Garvey has been so well got rid of."

"Yes, ma'am," said Dennis.

"Silence, on your life!"

"Oh, dear!"

The abbess now rather alarmed Claude Duval by coming at a slow and solemn step towards the very mock tomb, through the side of which he had made his way into the chapel. With great speed and dexterity, and yet with no sort of flurry, for that might at once have discovered the fact of his presence there, Claude passed through the hinged doorway of the tomb and so on to the top of the platform, upon which he crouched as low as he could.

The only thing that Claude Duval now dreaded was that Jack or Dick Turpin might call up to him something, in which case a full discovery of all that was taking place would most likely ensue, and all the powers of mischief of the abbess might be brought to bear upon the new train of circumstances that would open to her mind, and of which she had now no conception at all.

The idea did occur to Claude of just making a sudden dart and laying hold of her and making her a prisoner there and then upon the spot; but, still, he did not quite feel that that would suit him, for her outcries and the fright that would ensue with her would, in all probability, alarm the convent, and then the contest with the old nuns, which he wished for the sake of the females of his own party to avoid, would ensue.

As he lay, he considered that he was tolerably safe from the observation of the abbess, especially as she had, evidently, no sort of suspicion that any one was there; so he kept quiet, thinking that it would be time to be violent if any chance discovery of his presence there should take place.

As he suspected, the abbess had come to the tomb to listen if she could catch any sounds from below through its side.

Stooping close to the tomb, after placing her lamp upon the top of it, she pushed the hinged side of it open, and inclined her ear towards it for a few moments, which seemed a long time to Claude Duval.

Luckily no one spoke from below; but Father Gervey uttered a groan.

CLAUDE FORCING THE CONFESSOR INTO THE CELL.

CHAPTER CCCLXXII.

THE ESCAPE FROM THE CONVENT, AND THE ABBESS'S DISCOMFITURE.

THE abbess, in order the better to hear if any sound came from the vaults, very materially aided the concealment of Claude Duval, for she inclined her ear and not her eyes in the direction where he lay.

The groan that Father Garvey uttered in the anger and the despair of his spirit reached her, and was music to her ears.

"Ah, I hear them," she said—"I hear them now. They are dying—they are now dying!"

"True for you, ma'am," said Dennis.

The abbess started to her feet, for she had no desire to make Dennis acquainted with the secrets of the convent further than necessary, although she had retained him in the service of the unscrupulous system.

"Keep back!" she said, imperiously. "How dare you follow me, idiot?"

"Keep back is it, ma'am?"

"Yes, yes."

"Oh, then, ma'am, that's what I'll do. Me whole family has lost many and lots of honours all their lives by not going forward. But modesty, you see, ma'am, and diffidence is the great fault of me countrymen, and they can't help it."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, ma'am; that's true for you."

The abbess had let the door at the side of the tomb fall shut when she rose from her attitude of listening, so that about Claude Duval all was the most intense and impenetrable darkness again; but, situated as he was, he could hear every word that the abbess or Dennis thought proper to say.

"Their doom is fixed," said the abbess, "and you shall receive the reward that your faithful services to the church entitles you to."

"Many thanks to you, ma'am. Deed and faith, ma'am, it's a great thing to be able to serve the saints in this way, and to get the better of the heretics."

"It is—it is!"

"An' it's meself, ma'am, that would be glad to be always doing that same."

"Then you have no objection at all to remaining here permanently in the service of the convent, have you, Dennis?"

"No, ma'am."

"You will understand, then, that if you do so, you will have no foolish scruples about what you do?"

"Sure no, ma'am."

"Even what the world without calls murder must to you be a duty in this place, if you are called upon to do it."

"If the praste, ma'am, says that it's right, it isn't for the likes of me to say no to it. Surely, ma'am, his reverence knows what is right in all things, and it's his look-out, you know, ma'am, if it isn't."

"That is true, Dennis. In those few words you have embodied the one great principle of Catholicism, and for which the holy church has been contending ever since it was a church. The laity have no right to think at all about religion, or anything else that the clergy choose to decide about. All they have to do is to obey."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Dennis, you will suit us very well. You will reside here within the consent walls, and attend a little to the garden, and make yourself generally useful."

"Yes, ma'am."

"You will eat and drink of the very best, for nothing will be shut up from you in that respect."

"Bedad, ma'am, that will suit me."

"I should think it would; and, in addition to that, you will be well paid, and all you have to do is to obey our orders, be they what they may, without a doubt, a hesitation, or a question."

"Certainly, ma'am."

No doubt the abbess considered that in Dennis she had really met with a capital assistant in what further villanies and atrocities the progress of events might give rise to in the convent.

We can only wonder that superstition could so take hold of any human mind as to make it, like Dennis's, the slave of another person's iniquity, and induce it to give up the one great and indefeasible right that belongs to the whole human race—the right of thinking for itself.

But, as the lady abbess truly said, in that was to be found the one great principle of Catholicism for which the Church of Rome had ever fought, and for which it will ever fight.

Claude Duval was rather amused by the dialogue that he had had such a good opportunity of listening to between the abbess and Dennis; but he was in the hope now that they would both leave the chapel, so that he might be able to give notice to his friends below that the coast was clear, and commence forthwith concocting measures with them for an escape from the vaults.

In this hope Duval was disappointed, for in a few minutes he heard the abbess say gloomily, as she paced to and fro past the tomb—

"They will surely all die, and then this poor fool who has so freely entered into my service must go and cast them all into the well. Yes, the well—the well! How many secrets of this house does that hide!"

Claude remembered with a shudder what had come up in the bucket of the well, when an attempt had been made to get some water for the fainting novice.

"Dennis!" cried the abbess, sharply.

"Yes, ma'am."

"You will still keep watch here for some few hours."

"Yes, ma'am."

"And do not go to sleep. The fire-arms are still so placed that if you should hear any one at the door yonder trying to break it open, you can discharge them with a touch, and death must be the instant fate of any one or more persons on the other side."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Now I commend you to the saints. Farewell!"

"Amen!"

The lady abbess, like a ghost, stalked from the chapel, leaving Dennis on guard within it, and relying upon his stupidity and his superstition to keep him true and faithful to her.

When she was gone, Dennis took a turn up and down one of the aisles, and then he spoke to himself, saying—

"Bedad, then, this is a mighty quare change in me fortunes. Here I am in the service of the saints, and it's quite a blessed thing to think that I shall be on such mighty good terms with them that they will keep me quite out of purgatory when I get there, for I take it we can't all go there, if it is for ever so short a time. Well, it's a good thing I heard what that atheist of a Master Field was about with the bad lot that he picked up to help him, any way, and was able to tell all that same to the lady abbess. Oh, then, it's a holy woman she is, any way! I'll just sit down here, and try to keep awake by saying my prayers in the holy place, which can't fail to be pleasing to the saints hereaway. What if her ladyship does smother a few heretics and Orangemen in the cellars down below—isn't it all for the good of religion? To be sure it is—to be sure."

With this opinion, Dennis sat down very composedly to try to keep awake, and began the mumbling of some Latin prayer, of the meaning of which he had not the most distant conception in the world.

This process, though, instead of having the effect of keeping Dennis awake, had just the contrary one, for it sent him to sleep, and in the course of five minutes more Claude Duval had the gratification of hearing him snore away at a great rate.

"That will do," said Duval.

It was now the object of Claude to let his friends below know that he was all right, and that if ever a time had come when they might fairly expect to escape from the convent without creating any alarm, now was that time.

Leaning over the side of the little platform upon which he was, Claude called very gently to Jack—

"Jack—Jack!"

"Yes, Claude?"

"You and Dick can let me down now. Let go of the ropes, and I shall come easy enough to the ground, I daresay."

"All's right; wait a minute."

It was not to be supposed that during all this time Jack and Dick had been personally holding the ropes that held up the platform, with the weight of Claude Duval upon it. They had found a means of securing them in the proper place after hauling him, Duval, up to the roof.

It took them a minute or two to undo the knots they had made in the ropes, and then they let Claude carefully down.

During that time that they had been undoing the rope Duval had tied his handkerchief over his mouth, so that he was prepared against the effects of the noxious vapour that was in the lower part of the vaults beneath him.

Notwithstanding this precaution against the positively deadly consequences of breathing the noxious air that was below, Claude Duval felt, the moment he got into that had atmosphere, the great difference there was between it and the cool air in the chapel above, and he was all the more anxious to get his friends into a better state of things.

"Has anything happened," he said, "since I have been away from you?"

"No, Claude," said Jack; "but we have been in a state of great apprehension concerning you. We thought we heard voices above, and strange lights appeared, too, upon the roof, but as we heard nothing from you we thought it prudent to be perfectly quiet."

"It was indeed prudent. If you had spoken all might have been lost."

"All lost?"

"Yes. Listen to me, and I will tell you exactly the state of affairs above us in the chapel."

Claude Duval, then, very briefly but amply told them what he had overheard between the lady abbess and Dennis, and concluded by saying—

"Now that the abbess has left the chapel, and that Dennis is asleep in it, I think that the time has come when we should attempt to escape from here."

"But how?"

"I will tell you. You, Jack, and you, Dick, are quite strong enough to raise, by the aid of the ropes, the platform with me upon it and one of our fair friends here, and, therefore, I propose that I take them up to the chapel one after another in that way until all are safely there."

"That will do," said Dick; "but I propose that you take Mr. Field up first and show him the way, and then he will be there as a protection to the ladies, for should the abbess return or that rascal Dennis awaken, you know, and none of us be there, we don't know how much mischief a few seconds might produce."

"True—true, that is a good thought. Mr. Field, will you come?"

"Yes, ot once."

"Alicia shall follow you."

"No—no," said Alicia; "my poor young friend, who is really very unwell, shall go next; she has more need of a little fresh air than I have by a great deal. You will guard her?"

"I will," said Field, "with my life."

"Settle what order of precedence you all like best," said Claude Duval; "it don't matter to me one jot, for I am resolved that, if I live, you shall be free from this place. Now, Jack and Dick, come on, and let me show Mr. Field, since he is to go first, where he is to take up his position so as to aid and defend the ladies should he be called upon so to do."

Before Mr. Field went upon the platform with Claude Duval there was a silent pressure of the hand beetween him and Alicia, but they did not speak. The affection subsisting between them, and which the dangerous circumstances in which they were placed had tended to strengthen, wanted no words to make it well and truly understood.

Jack and Dick were not backward in attending to the ropes, and in another moment, Claude Duval and Mr. Field were slowly, but surely, going up to the roof of the vault.

When they reached there, Claude at once showed Field how to get into the chapel, and then he said to him in a whisper—

"Of course, you will be of the most material assistance to the ladies when I bring them up, and I pray that you direct them to keep here upon this spot, just beneath the level of this tomb, for I don't think Master Dennis is sleeping quite so soundly as we could wish."

"He shall sleep soundly enough," replied Mr. Field, in a similarly cautious tone of voice, "if he dares to interfere with me, or with any of those who will be soon, I hope, under my protection."

"That will do," said Claude.

Duval then called cautiously to Jack and Dick to let him down, which they did on the instant, and then he took up one of the novices in the same way that he had taken up Field, and by the aid of the latter she was safely got into the chapel, without any noise.

By repeating this process, the other novice and Alicia were placed in comparative safety, so that there remained in the vaults only Claude Duval and his two friends, Jack and Dick.

"Well, Claude," said Dick, "how are we to manage?"

"I have thought of that."

"Have you?" said Jack. "Well, I am glad to hear it."

"The ropes," added Claude, "can just be got hold of, I find, from above, and I think that if two of us get hold of them there we shall find no difficulty in hauling up any one man who may be here."

"That will do, then," said Dick Turpin. "Now do you and Jack go up together, for my experience of the power requisite to draw up the platform convinces me I can do it alone."

CHAPTER CCCLXXIII.

FATHER GARVEY REMONSTRATES AGAINST THE PROGRESS OF AFFAIRS IN THE VAULTS.

Claude Duval, although he had no sort of doubt upon his mind about the possibility of leaning through the opening at the bottom portion of the tomb in the chapel, and so pulling up the platform, still did not like the idea of leaving Dick Turpin the last in the vaults, and he said—

"No, Dick, no. If one person can pull the ropes from below here so as, by the aid of the weights that are attached to them, the platform can be fairly raised, let that person be me."

"Why so, Claude?"

"Because it is I who have brought about all this danger, and I think I ought to be the last in this place."

"Stuff—stuff! There is a good reason why you should go, now."

"What is is?"

"You have been enduring all the fatigue of going up and down, and of opening the tomb above, and I have been quite resting, comparatively speaking, here, so go at once."

"Dick is right," said Jack, "and I say, go at once. I do not myself offer to be the last to stay, because I think, and indeed I know, that my strength would be unequal to the task of pulling up the platform by the aid of the ropes here alone."

"Come on, then, Jack," said Claude; "we will delay no longer in the matter. Come on, old friend, at once."

Both Jack and Claude now got upon the platform; but before Dick Turpin could lay hold of the ropes to pull it up, they were all attracted by the extraordinary and agonizing contortions of the priest, who lay upon the floor with the handkerchief thrust into his mouth, just as he had been left for some time past.

The unhappy wretch managed to utter the most horrible groans, and to roll over and over, as though he were in a fearful agony of pain.

Claude Duval looked at him for a few moments, and then he said—

"Jack, I don't like that."

"Nor I," said Jack.

"Nor I," said Dick Turpin.

"It is true," added Claude, "that this is a very bad fellow, and that, if right were done, there is scarcely any amount of suffering that he don't deserve; but yet it is so truly awful to see a human being suffering such pangs, that I beg of you to relieve him, if you can, Jack."

"I will," said Dick Turpin. "Don't you get off the platform now that you are once on it, Jack. It is the handkerchief in his mouth that is choking him, I suppose. I will relieve him of it."

With this intention, Dick Turpin laid hold of the end of the handkerchief that was a little way out of the mouth of the confessor, and pulled it out entirely, when the unhappy man gasped several times, and lay perfectly still for a few seconds.

"He is dying," said Claude.

"I am afraid he is," said Jack.

The confessor opened his blood-shot eyes, and turning them upon Claude Duval and his friends, he said feebly—

"Mercy! mercy!"

"What can we do for you?" said Claude. "All that you now suffer, or that you have suffered, you have brought upon yourself, unhappy man that you are, by your conduct in this most villanous abode. Thank yourself for your sufferings."

"Oh, no—no! Have some mercy upon me!"

"What would you have me do?"

"Release me from these cords. They cut my flesh, and kill me. Oh, you will not leave me to die in this frightful place?"

"We cannot aid you."

"Yes—yes, you can—you can! Oh, yes, you know you can. It is easy to release me from these bonds. You are going yourselves away from here, and you will leave me to starve to death. Is that christian?"

"No, if we were going to do such a thing, your reproach would be just enough," said Claude Duval; "but we are not."

"You are—you are!"

"Not at all."

"But I see you all going—I see you now!"

"It does not fellow, because we are going, that you are to starve to death here. For your consolation—for I would not have even such a man as you suffer the pangs of experiencing such a death—I can tell you, that your mistress, the lady abbess——"

The confessor howled with rage at the mention of the abbess's name.

"Your mistress, the lady abbess, fancying that we shall all be dead, in the morning intends to send some one here to throw our bodies down the well."

"No—no!"

"But I say yes ; I heard her say so."

"She will forget."

"Then it is her fault, and not ours; and, once for all, I tell you, Sir Priest, that you will not be released further than you are now by us, for we will not trust you with the free use of your arms and your legs. Give him his handkerchief Dick, so that he may keep the noxious vapours of this place from his lungs, and then let him be."

"I don't think he is in any danger," said Dick, as he threw the handkerchief to the priest. "The savour of the vapour, which so nearly killed us all before we found out how to guard against it, seems to be dried up, and I don't think any more of it is being evolved now."

"Then he has really nothing to complain of."

"Nothing in the world."

"Wretches! Beasts!" cried the priest, as he strove in vain to rise from the attitude he was in. "I consign you all to perdition! May you all fail not to feel doubly and trebly the torments that I feel! I solemly curse you all in sleeping and waking—in sitting and in lying—in standing and in walking—at home and abroad—in eating and in drinking! Curse you all! Amen!"

"My dear sir," said Dick, "if it be any amusement to you to curse us, pray go on at it as long as you think proper."

"Perdition catch you all!"

"Very good, sir, only you will recollect, if you please, the old proverb to the effect, that curses are like chickens—they always, sooner or later, come home to roost."

"Bah!"

'You may say 'bah!' as much as you like, but if you look at us you will not fail, with your great sagacity, to see that—

'Notwithstanding this terrible curse,
We don't yet feel a penny the worse;'

so good night, sir, and I hope you and the rats will be hearty company for each other."

The father-confessor only glared at Dick Turpin, now, as though he would have eaten him up if he could, and Dick, taking no further notice of him or his rage, went to the ropes for the purpose of exerting his strength to draw up Jack and Claude Duval to the opening in the roof.

There was no great difficulty in doing this, and Dick had the pleasure of seeing them both in safety at the roof of the vault, and after that pass into the chapel itself. He then let down the platform for his own accommodation, but it could hardly have been possible for any human being not to feel some sort of sensation of terror and of loneliness in the situation that Dick Turpin was now left.

We should very much wrong Dick if for one moment we were to insinuate a doubt of the good faith of his friends above. Turpin knew well that rather than leave him there they would all come down again and stay with him, let the consequences be what they might.

It was not the feeling that he was deserted that crept over the soul of Turpin in that dismal abode, but it was a kind of shuddering one at finding that he was, to all social intents, alone in a region which had been, no doubt, for so long a time consecrated to the Demon of Murder.

To be sure, the father-confessor was there; but we cannot wonder that he, as company, did not occupy a very large share of the attention of Dick Turpin.

After a few moments the voice of Claude Duval came clearly down to him, although Claude still spoke only in the most cautious of whispers.

"Dick—Dick?"

"All right, Claude."

"Do you see me?"

"Dimly I do. Is all right above?"

"Yes, Dick; get on to the platform now, and let Jack and I draw you up."

"Do you think you can do it?"

"We will do it, so we don't intend to think about it, I assure you, Dick. Are you ready?"

"Yes, quite ready."

Dick Turpin could not conceal from himself the fact that the old ropes that connected the platform with the roof had creaked very ominously as Jack and Claude went up, and the idea now came across him that nothing was much more probable than that at this the last moment they might break and let him down. In that case, even if he escaped personal injury of a serious character from the fall, his situation in the vaults would be rather critical.

To be sure, there was the door at the head of the stairs, leading into the chapel, by the side of the confessionals, and by that his friends above might, admitting them to have the power to do so, release him; but, upon the whole, Dick would very much rather be with them in the chapel.

With such feelings and such apprehensions, rational and likely as they were, it may be guessed that Dick did not much enjoy his little voyage from the floor of the vaults to the ceiling.

It was not the easiest thing in the world for Claude Duval and Jack even, although they were as efficiently as he could do so assisted by Mr. Field, to draw Dick Turpin up to the orifice in the tomb.

Nothing but their thorough determination to pull him up, if it was at all possible to do so, prevailed over the difficulties they had to encounter, which difficulties were mainly on account of the very awkward position they were forced to get into to bring any strength to bear upon the ropes at all.

"Take it easy," said Dick, when he was about half way up. "Take it easy. The old ropes are straining fearfully."

"The deuce they are," said Claude.

"Yes, yes. I hear them."

"And so do I," said Jack.

"Hush!" whispered Duval. "Don't say another word, Jack, but pull him up."

A few more minutes sufficed to bring Dick nearly to the top of the place, and then he stretched up his hands and made a clutch at the rim of the orifice, close to where Claude and Jack were leaning over the sides. Fortunately, the clutch was successful, and the principal weight of Dick Turpin was no longer on the little platform.

"Give me a little help, and I am with you," said Dick.

Claude clutched him by the collar, and with a great exertion of strength, fairly pulled him through the side of the mock tomb, and placed him in safety in the chapel.

Dick Turpin then drew a long breath, and shook his head, as he said—

"I wonder what could tempt me to go down and come up again upon that frail concern."

"Thank the fates," said Claude, "you have no need so to do, nor have any of us, either."

"You forget the necessity of caution," said Jack. "I pray you to speak low, Claude. It is true that Dennis's nose, by the tune that it is playing, lets us know that he is fast asleep; but yet, it is just as well that we should be as careful as possible."

"It is better to be so, Jack. Now, let me see. Are we all assembled here and ready for a start?"

"All—all!"

"And the ladies are recovered, I hope, from the sufferings of the dismal place from which we have so happily escaped?"

"Oh, yes," said Alicia, "we are quite well now, and happy."

"Then, gentlemen," said Claude, "look to your arms, for we will now,

THE REUNION OF ALICIA AND THE NOVICE IN THE CONVENT DUNGEONS

despite any sort of resistance that can be offered to us, leave this place. I, for one, will fight to the last, and I am quite sure you will all do so likewise."

"We will!" they replied.

It was at this moment that the convent bell began to toll dismally, and they were all so astonished at the sounds at such an hour, that they crouched down behind the mock tomb with a feeling of consternation, and something like dismay.

Of course, the most natural idea in the world was, that the tolling of the bell was some sort of alarm given of their presence in the chapel; but they soon found cause to alter that opinion.

The monotonous tolling of the bell continued for the space of about three minutes, during which Claude Duval and his party looked at each other as well as they could in the faint light that the chapel afforded them, as though each would ask of each some kind of explanation of what it really meant.

It was one of the young novices who then, in a tone of alarm, said—

"I know what this means—oh, I know too well!"

"What does it mean?" said Claude Duval. "I charge you to tell us at once."

"It is what the abbess calls an early chapel, and is held one hour before sunrise, to try some guilty nun or novice for some offence against her."

CHAPTER CCCLXXIV.

THE TRIAL OF THE DELINQUENT NOVICE IN THE CONVENT CHAPEL.

When the young girl gave this explanation of the cause of the ringing of the convent bell in so dismal a manner, it suddenly ceased, and the stillness that succeeded had something awful and solemn in it.

Claude Duval turned to Alicia, saying—

"Do you, too, think that the explanation we have heard of the cause of the ringing of the convent bell is the correct one?"

"Alas, I know not. I have not been sufficiently long an inmate of the place, thank Heaven, to become acquainted with all its manners and customs."

"It is so, I assure you," said the novice, and then she appealed to the other one, who was rather unwell, as she it was who had fainted in the vaults, and her statement was at once by her confirmed.

"Well," said Duval, "it don't matter to us, that is one comfort, and perhaps it is all the better that the abbess should be occupied with her own affairs, so that she won't have any time to interfere with ours. There can be no doubt but that she thinks us by this time all dead in the vaults, and so feels herself at full liberty to go on with her regular devotions, without troubling herself further about us."

"Oh, sir," said the novice, "but how shall we escape hence?"

"Escape hence? Why, by leaving this place. I propose to wait here now for a few minutes longer until we can fairly assume that the abbess is quite busy tending the conference or council you speak of, and then we will make our way into the garden, and be off at once."

"But, good gracious," cried the novice, in a tone of voice that, considering the neighbourhood of even the slumbering Dennis, was not a prudent one to trust to the still air of the chapel, "it is here that the trial will be held."

"Here?"

"Yes, here, in the chapel."

"The deuce it is."

"There is danger, you see, sir."

"I do, indeed. What the deuce is to be done now, I wonder? This is rather awkward. Never mind, though, they are not here yet, and we may still, if we are quick about it, have time to escape. This way—this way!"

"Hush," said Jack. "Look there."

Jack pointed to the steps of the altar, down which the abbess was now slowly coming, guarding the lamp she held in her hand against the draughts in the chapel. It was, no doubt, to the fact that the little flickering flame of the lamp demanded all her attention that Claude Duval and his friends escaped the penetrating glance which she otherwise would have sent round the chapel.

"Stoop, all of you," whispered Claude.

They all shrank down, now, below the level of the top of the tomb, so that even if the abbess were to pause and look in that direction, she would not see them amid the dusky air of the place.

"What is to be done?" whispered Mr. Field.

"Hush," said Alicia, "speak only in whispers, for the love of life! If we could get about twenty feet to the right of this spot we should reach the confessionals, and two of them would hold us all. It is very unlikely that they would be visited by any one, and as there is no Father Garvey to take possession of one of them we should be safe there until the trial was over."

"We will try it," said Claude Duval, "at all events."

"Do so—oh, do so," said Mr. Field.

The abbess reached the foot of the altar steps, and then, still shading her lamp with her hand, she said, in a low voice——

"Dennis—Dennis?"

A loud note of anything but a musical character from the nose of the slumbering Dennis was the only answer to the lady abbess's call.

"Dennis—Dennis, I say?"

Another snoring sound was the reply.

"The wretch sleeps," said the abbess.

It was, no doubt, the anger of the lady abbess that made her quite forgetful of the fact that the little lamp she carried in her hand was, from some cause or another, burning very feebly and required great care to keep alight, for with hasty steps, and without shading it at all from any sudden rush of air, she advanced towards where the nasal sounds convinced her that the slumbering Dennis gave so loud an idea of vigilance upon his part, and the lamp instantly went out.

We are afraid that at this juncture the abbess of the convent uttered an exclamation that was much more strong than polite.

"What can be the matter with the lamp?" she then said, in a more subdued tone. "It was wont to burn well. Father Garvey, when he was alive—ha! ha! now he is dead—but when he was alive, he used to say, that the well in the vaults gave forth poisonous exhalations, and that such hindered the burning of the wax tapers in the altar sconces; but I never believed him."

After, with some dexterity, and once with partial effect, trying to blow the lamp into a flame again, which may be done sometimes, if done with tact, she found that there was no recourse but to go to the farther end of the chapel, where the dim light was burning before the effigy of the Virgin Mary in a niche, and by its aid re-illume her hand lamp.

Dennis went on swearing, certainly, at a most awful rate, and the abbess, after shaking her clenched hand at him, went with quick steps to the little image of the Virgin with the lamp.

Neither Claude Duval nor his friends could have the least difficulty in being cognisant of all these proceedings on the part of the abbess, and amid the stillness that was in the chapel, they could hear, with the greatest ease, everything that she said. When the abbess moved off to the far end of the chapel in quest of a light, Claude felt that then was the opportunity, and the only one, that in all probability they could have of concealing themselves in the confessionals.

In quite a low, anxious whisper, he spoke to Alicia, saying—

"If you can manage to guide us to the confessionals you speak of, do so now, if you please. If they are close at hand, and if there should be no difficulty in getting admission to them, now is the time."

"It is—it is. Come."

They had all heard what Claude said to Alicia, so there was no time lost in any explanation, and they followed her along the aisle with rapidity. They took good care to keep in stooping attitudes, so that they might not be seen by any accident; and then Alicia opened one of the confessional doors, saying—

"This will hold some of us."

"It will hold us all," said the novice, who had fainted in the vaults below. "It will hold us all."

"Nay!"

"Yes—yes, it will. There is an inner chamber to this one confessional, which Father Garvey used often to sleep in."

It certainly was possible that the confessional, without an inner chamber at all, might have hold them all; but in order to make it do so, they would have had to stand up rather closely to each other. The novice, though, was well aware that at the back of the confessional there was a little door that opened to a chamber, about twelve feet square, in which the holy father used to repose after the labour of attending to the confessions of his penitents at the convent. Upon one occasion, curiosity prompted her to make the most diligent search for that little door, and she had not only found out its exact position, but had made herself acquainted with the secret spring by the aid of which it was opened.

This knowledge stood her in good stead now.

Imagine then, the whole party, which now consisted of no less than seven persons, safely in the confessional, and the door closed. The novice found the spring of the door in the wall, leading to the other chamber, and there they had plenty of room.

All this did not occupy many moments in accomplishing, and it was well that it did not, for Claude Duval felt rather uneasy every minute that the lady abbess was out of his sight.

There was one great advantage, though, connected with getting into the chapel, and that was, that the girls could have a good rest in the priest's chamber, which was very luxuriously and handsomely furnished.

To be sure, the darkness there was something that might, indeed, be called profound; but if they felt around them, almost wherever they did so they found some soft sofas or easy chairs, in which one might sit and doze the hours pleasantly enough away.

"Now, for Heaven's sake," said Claude Duval, "be quiet, ladies, while we men look into the chapel as well as we can from the door of the cosfessional, and see what goes on there."

"There is no occasion to look from the door," said Alicia; "there is a grated window which will afford you an easy view. It is covered with wire gauze, too, so that you can see out from here, and, while there is no light in the confessional, no one can see you."

"The very thing," said Claude.

As he spoke, the convent bell began to toll again, and the novice said—

"That is the second bell. The nuns will assemble now, and bring in their prisoner at once."

Claude Duval was exceedingly anxious to see all that might transpire in the chapel, and along with Dick Turpin, Jack, and Mr. Field, who, by-the-bye, converted himself into a sort of general intelligencer between the ladies in the priest's room and the confessional, through the gauze wire of which the proceedings in the chapel could be seen, took up their posts at that spot.

This second time that the bell rang was for a very short time indeed, and then there was a shuffling of feet in the corridor leading to the chapel, but as yet no one but the abbess was to be seen within its walls.

The abbess had re-illumined her hand lamp at the little shrine of the Virgin, and had approached Dennis, to whom she administered two or three kicks, and he woke up, saying—

"Murder! murder! Oh, bedad, and what's that same——"

"Wretch!

"Oh, ma'am, and then, sure, is it you?"

"Beast!"

"Is it a baste, ma'am, you are after calling me?"

"Yes."

"Oh, then, ma'am, I'd rather not, for sure and it don't seem fine and aisy for such a lady as yourself, ma'am, to be destroying your elegant mouth with such words."

"You are an idle, good-for-nothing fool, and your life ought to pay the penalty of your folly. How dare you come here and undertake a duty, and then neglect it?"

"Neglect it, ma'am?"

"Yes, neglect it."

"And pray, ma'am, if it's all the same to you, what was the duty, ma'am?"

"To keep the most diligent watch in the chapel."

"And didn't I, ma'am?"

"You know you did not. You slept as soon as my back was turned."

"Oh, no, ma'am."

"Oh, no? But I say, oh, yes."

"Bedad then, ma'am it isn't right to contradict your ladyship, but I only slept with one eye, and I assure you, my lady, that the other was continually rolling round and round, and doing the duty of twenty soldiers, ma'am, all on duty with a sword and a blunderbuss each of them, ma'am."

"Idiot!"

"Yes, ma'am—I'm sure, ma'am, it's quite a pleasure to be anything your ladyship may happen to like best."

There was a decided tone of insolence about Dennis now. That inevitable effect upon a small mind of being useful was beginning to take its course with him. He was beginning to improve upon it, and to fancy that he might say and do things that otherwise he would not have dreamt of.

Nothing but the ignorance of this man could possibly have induced him to act in this way, for after what he knew of the proceedings within the convent was it likely that such a woman as the abbess would, for long, endure either his presence or his insolence?

No. The danger of the position in which Dennis stood was such that any one with a very little more sense than he had must have seen it, and the look that the abbess gave him was truly that of the basilisk, for it promised death to him.

"Very well, Dennis," she said, quite mildly. "I daresay you are quite right."

"True for you, ma'am."

"And so, as the business that I come to the chapel upon now is rather of a private nature, you will oblige me by going up the steps of the altar and making your way behind it, where you will see a door in the wall. By pursuing the passage beyond that door you will come to my apartment."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Wine is on the table. I need say no more."

"Troth, ma'am, and you need not, any way. Good luck to you, ma'am."

Dennis left the chapel by the route indicated to him by the abbess, while from an arched door at the farther end of the aisle there entered the building a long row of nuns in the habit of their order, and with their arms crossed over their breasts, and walking slowly like people who are given to somnambulism

CHAPTER CCCLXXV.

CLAUDE DUVAL STAYS THE EXECUTION OF A JUDICIAL SENTENCE.

CLAUDE DUVAL thought that surely there must be something more in the character of these proceedings, so full of formality as they were, than the mere passing sentence upon one whose crime was only a crime affecting the peculiar position in which she was placed, and who might be adjudged to any punishment the person in power chose, without even the fraction of an examination into the circumstances of the case.

It seemed as if, to use a common expression, the abbess, who reigned in that convent, certainly, with absolute authority, was making much ado about nothing in this trial of the novice.

But when we come to consider that catholicity, as understood by the Church of Rome, is a system, and that in all its parts it abounds with ceremonials of the most sombre, as well as of the most glittering character, and that without those ceremonials it is nothing, we shall see how even those who are united, with absolute authority, under its jurisdiction, have to conform to those general principles by which the whole of the system is carried on.

The trials, too, of the inmates of convents and of nunneries were considered by the Catholic Church as useful in another point of view. They taught those who were present at them what was the peculiar crime that had to be avoided; and this was a knowledge that, with all the concomitants and ceremonies of a trial, was advanced at much greater length than as if it had merely stated that so and so was punished by order of the superiors for such and such conduct.

Besides, these forms and ceremonies kept up the semblance of something like a regal state; for what would be regality without its nice ceremonies?

Thus, then, was it that the abbess of the convent took the trouble of solemnly trying, or seeming solemnly to try, one over whom she had sovereign authority, and whom she had quite made up her mind beforehand to adjudge guilty; the amount of punishment that she was to receive had, no doubt, been completely settled in the mind of the abbess.

This was the only way in which Claude Duval could to his own mind, in anything like a satisfactory manner, account for the vast trouble that was taken to make something that, in reality, was quite arbitrary, appear to be something strictly in accordance with justice, always assuming that the affair was really an offence.

The long and really solemn procession of nuns came slowly along the aisle, and what with their sombre dresses, the dim religious light of the place, and the strange ghost-like manner in which they glided along, Claude could not help admitting to himself, that the catholic was indeed the faith that, of all others, mostly took the imagination prisoner.

The nuns soon arranged themselves in a circle round the steps of the altar, or rather, we should say, round the space of the chapel immediately in front of those steps; and then a chair of an ancient looking form, with much gilding upon it, and a carved angel's head at the corners both of the seat and back, was placed in the centre of the half circle of nuns, rather close to the steps of the altar.

The seat, of course, was for the lady abbess.

A death-like stillness now reigned in the chapel, for the bell had ceased to toll, and the abbess was hidden somewhere. It suited her better not to appear till all the nuns were assembled, and then she could do so with effect; and so, from behind the altar she made her appearance.

The nuns all bowed reverently before her.

Claude Duval, if he had not enjoyed the rather frequent opportunities that he had of seeing the abbess, certainly would not have known her now, in her robes of office.

From some receptacle at the back of the altar where they were kept, she had procured them, and placed then over her other apparel, so that she presented rather a gorgeous appearance as she stepped forward to take her place in the seat of authority that had been placed for her.

"Silence!" cried the abbess, after rather a long pause. "Have you prayed?"

"We have," said all the nuns.

"Sisters, have you remembered the sinner in your prayers?"

"We have."

"Do you think, sisters, that in the time which is to come, and which will be without end, she will find favour?"

"She will."

"That is well. We would have it so from the bottom of our hearts."

An old nun now stepped forward from the rest, and kneeling at the feet of the abbess, she said—

"Holy mother, it is true that the sinner shall find peace and mercy in the world which is to come, through the intercession of the church; but that state can only arise after she has passed the bar of human justice."

"What would you have?" said the abbess.

"Her trial."

"Whose trial?"

"The novice, Frances."

"Be it so."

Now, all this was repeated in such a style that it was quite evident to Claude Duval and his friends that it was nothing in the world but a regularly established farce; so that when one of the nuns or novices was tried for any offence, real or supposed, the abbess should be able to say that she had been called upon by all the sisterhood, in full chapter assembled, to take that course.

When the abbess had said, "Be it so," the old nun rose from her knees, and retired among the sisters.

After a few moments' thought, then, the abbess gave out the words of a kind of hymn of praise, which was sung in the space of about three minutes by the nuns; and then, as the echo of the voices died away, she said—

"Bring the culprit hither."

There was a considerable stir among some of the old nuns now, and then about half a dozen of them started upon the errand in search of her whom the abbess was pleased at that early stage of the proceedings to call the culprit, although professed only to be sitting there to try her for alleged offences.

During this pause in the proceedings Claude Duval took the opportunity of asking Alicia if she knew a novice by the name of Frances.

"Oh, yes," she replied. "She is a beautiful young girl, and has only been in the convent about a month."

"What is her age?"

"Not exceeding sixteen, I should say, and she has the greatest dislike to a conventual life, and has expressed as much."

"How came she here, then?"

"She has been forced here by her friends, being originally deceived into the idea that it was a boarding school."

"Then her offence for which she is about to be tried is, no doubt, just for expressing a dislike to the convent?"

"Oh, no—no!"

"No? What else can she have done?"

"Something that you will, no doubt, hear alleged against her, whether it be true or not; but that is not the offence. If that were to make a high cause of, the lady abbess would have nothing in the world to to but to hold chapters for the trial of all the novices in the convent."

"And the nuns—do they never grow uneasy?"

"Yes; but the punishment of anything in the way of apparent repentance of having taken the vows to which they would be subjected is so severe, that they are terrified into silence; and after a long time the mind gets vitiated and habituated to this sort of life, and from weeping and wailing in secret over their own sufferings, they get to take a pleasure in inflicting them upon others."

"No doubt."

"Claude—Claude," said Turpin, "come to the grating here—come now."

Claude hastily applied his eye to the wire gauze once again, and he heard a great shuffling noise in the immediate vicinity of the chapel as he did so.

A door in the wall was flung open, and then the old nuns who had left to seek her whom the abbess had called the culprit made their appearance, dragging some one with them.

"Help! Oh, have mercy upon me!" cried a voice.

Claude Duval felt the hot blood of indignation rise to his face, and he placed his hand upon the door of the confessional.

"Hold," whispered Jack.

"But can I hear this?"

"Yes. Wait a bit. Remember that we have it in our power, at any moment, to step forward to the release of the young girl."

"Yes; but——"

"Nay, Claude, be patient yet awhile."

"I will try to be so."

The old nuns dragged into the chapel a young and beautiful girl, whose long hair hung down to her waist, and one of the old hags had a mass of it twisted round her hand, with which she gave the poor girl such tugs that it was a wonder she did not pull that quantity out by the roots.

The other old nuns followed and kept striking her severe blows about the head, neck, and shoulders.

"On—on," cried the hag that had hold of the girl by the hair. "Come on, wretch—come on, heretic! Ha—ha! I have you!"

"Release me—oh, release me! I will follow you if it be to death, but do not torture me thus!"

"I will torture you, you wretch. So, you think because you have a pretty face that you won't stay in the convent, do you?"

"Mercy—mercy!"

"Take that, and that."

The old hag tugged at the young girl's hair as she spoke, and Claude said, in a whisper—

"Jack, get your head on one side."

"What for?"

"I am going to shoot that old devil."

"No—no. Look!"

Goaded at last to desperation by the suffering she endured and the torments of the old nun, the young girl rushed forward and sent her sprawling upon the pavement of the chapel, against which her head came with an ominous sort of crack.

The old hag, to try to save herself, let go of the hair of the young girl, who, thus being free for a moment, bounded forward, and kneeling at the feet of the lady abbess, she cried—

"Madam, you are the superior of this convent, and your word is law. If I have done anything for which you feel that you have a right to punish me, let me hear what it is, but do not sit there and suffer me to be ill-treated by these persons whom I both hate and despise."

The abbess looked coldly at the young girl.

"The sisters of the convent are not," she said, "to be hated and despised."

"Yes, if they are hateful, and if they do despicable things."

"Silence!"

The novice rose from her kneeling posture and looked around her with disdain upon her countenance, and Claude Duval, as he looked at her, thought her certainly the sweetest creature of her age that he had ever seen.

"Let me kill her—let me kill her!" cried a voice.

At the same moment the old hag who had had the tumble upon the cold and hard pavement of the chapel, half blinded by her rage and her dishevelled locks, made a rush at the novice, but the young girl dexterously slipped aside, and the hag, unable to stop herself, or really not seeing where she was going, flew right in the abbess's face and imprinted half a dozen terrible long scratches upon her, to the great danger of her eyes, at the same time that she cuffed her about the ears with the other hand in a most vicious manner.

The abbess was so completely taken by surprise, and confounded by the sudden character of this attack, that she had got all the worst of it before she could recover herself sufficiently to resist it. Then, with a shriek of rage, and pain, she laid hold of the hag by the throat and dashed her to the floor, and kicked and struck her with such ardour, that sense or life seemed to leave the old woman, and she lay passive and covered with blood at the feet of the revengeful abbess.

FRANCES BROUGHT BEFORE THE ABBESS ON A CHARGE OF HERESY.

CHAPTER CCCLXXVI.

THE DOOM OF THE YOUNG NOVICE IS PRONOUNCED.

This most infuriate encounter between the abbess and the old hag who had used the novice, Frances, so ill, was so delightful to Claude Duval and his friends hat they actually danceed again while it was going on, and Claude himself had he greatest difficulty to prevent himself from calling out in a loud voice—

"Bravo—bravo!"

Prudence, however, and a desire to hear what might further take place, restrained him, so he listened and watched the proceedings in the chapel with still greater interest than before.

The wild rage of the abbess was such that it was some time before she could command her voice to speak, and when she did it was more in a scream than in any other sort of tone.

"Is the wretch dead? Is she dead?" she cried.

As she spoke, she jumped upon the body of the old nun again, and evidently very much enjoyed the doing so.

The other nuns looked aghast at all this, and then, with one accord, they called out in reply—

"Dead—dead! Yes, she is dead."

The abbess sunk back into her chair again, and applied her handkerchief to the long bleeding scratches in her face, and then, in a quiet tone, she said—

"And you all stood by and saw me thus treated. Yes, none of you moved an inch."

They all dropped on their knees, and were beginning some sort of lamentation; but the abbess, by an impressive gesture, stopped them, saying—

"Peace—peace, I say! Be still."

They all rose.

"Take this wretch," added the abbess, pointing to the insensible form of the old hag—"take this wretch, and, whether she be alive or dead, cast her through the bishop's tomb into the vault."

Even the old nuns looked at each other, and shuddered.

"Do my bidding, or woe be to you all!" cried the abbess.

It was evident that they did not consider this an idle threat, or as one that could with any degree of safety be disregarded, for they advanced, and lifted the body of the old nun from the floor.

"Away with her!" shouted the abbess. "Away with her, and let me never look upon her hideous face again."

The nuns lifted the hag, and as they did so, she showed some slight signs of returning consciousness; but they all bore her to the tomb, which covered the opening to the vaults, by the aid of which Claude Duval and his party had reached the chapel. They laid her upon the floor at full length, by the side of the swinging side of the tomb.

"Away with her!" cried the abbess.

They kicked her against the swinging board, and in another moment she was gone!

This was, in sober and plain truth, rather an awkward state of affairs to have to contend against. Claude Duval hardly felt satisfied not to interfere while murder was going on before his very face in this sort of way; and yet as the mischief was all confined to those with whom he could not have any special sympathy, he did not like to step forth, and say—"I will put a stop to this."

The nuns, when they had pushed the body of the old hag through the opening in the vaulted roof, stood for a few moments listening. There was then a strange wailing noise as the platform descended with her, and then there was a piercing shriek!

The nuns started.

"She was alive!" cried the abbess, as she clapped her hands together in joy at the thought, for from that fact she considered her triumph and her revenge to be all the greater. "She was alive! Ha! ha! she was alive!"

"She was," said the nuns.

"'Tis well—oh, 'tis very well! Now she will suffer, and may she feel the weight of my greatest curse!"

"Amen!" said the nuns.

"Come now, sisters," said the abbess, "come to me, and let us forget the wretch, of whom we are so well rid, while we proceed to investigate the crimes of the novice now before us. Come hither! come hither!"

The thought that she would be so fully and so amply revenged upon the old hag who had scratched and buffeted her at such a rate seemed to give the lady abbess pleasure sufficient to obliterate for the moment the sense of the injuries she had received, and she had spoken in much of her usual tone of voice.

The nuns, in pursuance of the orders they received, again collected in a half circle round the abbess, and the young prisoner, looking pale and anxious, for she fully expected death, stood in the centre of them, and facing the abbess.

A kind of established form was now proceeded with in the accusation of the young novice, for the abbess pointing to her, said—

"Who is this?"

"A novice of the convent," said one of the nuns.

"Her name?"

"Child Frances."

The novices generally were called child so-and-so, whatever their names might be, and the nuns were called sisters.

"Why is she here?"

"For sin committed."

"Is this so?"

"No!" said Frances.

"She says no?"

"But she ought to say, yes. It is the devil that has whispered to her to say no to the charge."

"Alas!" said the abbess, "unhappy girl! why do you not at once and heartily confess your great sin, and upon your knees ask for the forgiveness of the church, and of us? It might be then that your punishment would not be so very severe; but if you are obstinate, there is no saying how far the saints may wish us to go against you."

"With what am I charged?" said the young girl. "What is the meaning of all this? Tell me what it is you charge me with doing that I had not the most perfect right in the world to do?"

"Silence! you are a prisoner."

"Alas! I know it. I have been ever since I set foot within this dreadful place."

"That is contumaciousness," said a nun.

"It is," said the abbess; "but we will proceed, not heeding it just now. It seems to me that the charge against you, is this."

As she spoke, she took a written paper from her bosom, and handed it to one of the nuns, who in a drawling tone read as follows from it—

"'This certifies that Child Frances is a novice in this holy house, and that on the Wednesday of the last week, instigated by the devil, she threw over the wall of the garden a certain written paper, highly to the injury of the saints and the Holy Catholic Church.'"

"You hear, Child Frances?" said the abbess. "That is the accusation."

"I do hear."

"And what have you to say to it?"

"You know well what I have to say to it. I am here a prisoner. I am kept here against my will, and denying the right of every one so to imprison me. I say that I have the right to do all I can to obtain my liberty."

"Is that your answer?"

"It is."

"Unhappy girl! you know not what you say."

"I do know."

"Peace—peace! Read the letter which, by quite a miracle, owing to the saints being continually heaping favours upon this convent, we found by one who brought it to me, instead of carrying it to any heretic, who would, no doubt, have made use of it against us."

The nun who had made the accusation now produced another note, which she read as follows:—

"'This is addressed to any one who may find it, and who, with Christian feeling, may be disposed to aid the writer. My name is Frances Atherton, and I am confined against my will in the convent at the corner of the lane—it is called Berrymead. What I wish is that the finder of this note would go to some magistrate and place it in his hands, so that he may feel it to be his duty, as, no doubt, it will likewise be his intention, to take such steps as will release me from the odious and unjust imprionment that I suffer.

"'May Heaven reward you for aiding me,

"'FRANCES ATHERTON.'"

"Is that your writing?" asked the superior of the novice.

"It is."

"And what were your expectations consequent upon that being found?"

"My expectations were what I mention in it."

"Wretch!"

"The wretches are those who forced me, in self defence, to write it, and who now insult me for so doing."

"Ha—ha! you are bold."

"I am."

"And yet you are here."

"And yet, as you say, madam, I am here. You think that I am in your power, but surely heaven will not look down upon us all this day and suffer me to be sacrificed."

"You will see."

"I hope so, and that the seeing will consist of some aid coming to me."

"Holy sisters," said the superior, "you have heard the accusation against this Child Frances, and you have heard that she admits her guilt. What say you— is she a guilty one, or is common-sense and light a delusion?"

"Guilty!"

"'Tis well."

The whole of the nuns had spoken at once, and the echo of their voices had a strange effect in the old chapel. Poor Frances seemed hardly able to support herself, and the courage with which she had hitherto spoken and borne her trial appeared to be giving way. She turned very pale, and as her eye ran over the array of countenances around her she could see no glance of compassion in any of them.

Then she looked at the abbess who was in deep thought, with her head resting upon her hands, or who affected to be so and assumed that position.

"Madam," said Frances, "madam?"

"Go on."

"I cannot see that my offence is one that is not so natural that your own sense of justice must acquit me of any frailty. What would you do if you were a prisoner anywhere? What would you do but try all manner of means in order to effect your escape, if possible?"

"Peace!"

The abbess looked up, and there was such an awful expression upon her face that even some of the oldest nuns started back a pace or two and regarded her with terror as they guessed what was coming.

"Sisters!" said the abbess.

They all very reverently bowed their heads.

"Sisters!" she said again, "it is necessary in this convent that some terrible example should be made."

"Amen!" said the nuns.

"The spirit of disaffection and of dissatisfaction is abroad," continued the abbess, "and it must be checked. The saints have whispered counsel to me, and the sentence I now pass upon the culprit here before us is theirs, not mine."

"Amen!"

"Bring the feather couches!"

There was a movement among the nuns as though a shock of electricity had passed through them all.

"Bring the feather couches!" said the abbess again.

"Amen!" said one.

The rest struck their breasts, and then all said—"Amen!" Half a dozen of them left the chapel, and Frances looked about her with an unknown dread, for she did not know what fetching the feather couches really meant, and in what way they concerned her.

In the course of five minutes the nuns who had left the chapel came back, bearing with them two large feather beds. One of them they laid exactly at the feet of the abbess, and flattened it out. The other they then laid by the side of the first one, and likewise flattened it out.

"What is the meaning of this?" said Frances.

"You will soon know," said one of the nuns.

"Silence!" cried the abbess.

"But this is absurd," said Frances. "I protest against any punishment which you would seek to inflict upon me, and I bid you beware of the consequences. If there be law and justice in England, you will hear of it."

"Peace, girl! Peace, I say!"

"I will not hold my peace, and so seem to submit to your capricious and unfeeling dictates. I will not!"

"Seize her, and bind her!"

The nuns made a rush at the young novice, and held her arms.

CHAPTER CCCLXXVII.

DETAILS THE PROJECTED MURDER AT THE OLD CONVENT.

If Frances, the young novice, was surprised at the rather singular preparations that were being made, and in which she was evidently the principal person concerned, Claude Duval and his friends were not less so.

With very great interest, because all the proceedings were very new and very strange, they had listened to the mockery of a trial that had taken place in the chapel; but what was to be done with the two feather beds that the abbess had sent for was beyond their ability to conjecture.

"Dick?" whispered Claude.

"Yes, Claude?"

"What do you think of this?"

"I don't know what to think. It gets the better of me altogether. Have you any idea about its meaning?"

"Not the least."

"Let's wait, then, quietly."

"Be it so; but upon the least evidence of any real danger to that young girl, it seems to me now that we must risk everything, and show ourselves. Do you agree to that, all of you?"

"We do—we do!" they all said.

"Very well, then; will you leave it to me to say when the interference is to be undertaken? I do not ask from any feeling of vanity, but just because it must be left, you know, to some one."

"We leave all to you," said Mr. Field.

Both Jack and Dick concurred in this by a few short words, so that Claude Duval felt that the fate of the young novice remained in his hands, and he only waited before actually interfering to hear what extraordinary villany the lady abbess was going to give utterance to, in the shape of a command.

They had not to wait long for the denouement of the affair. The abbess had for some few minutes affected to be in deep thought, or prayer, again; and then she looked up with her face frightfully pale, save where the red streaks of the scratches that the old woman who had been tumbled headlong into the vaults had given her shone up in strong relief, and said—

"Is all ready?"

"All ready," said the nuns.

"Ready for what?" cried Frances.

"Bind her."

Some one of the nuns produced a cord, by the aid of which they bound the hands of Frances behind her, so that it was out of the question that she could make any effectual resistance to what they were about to do.

"The letter," said the abbess. "Where is it?"

"Here, holy sister."

The letter that Frances had written and thrown over the convent wall was handed to the abbess, who thereupon cast it upon the feather bed that was nearest to her.

"Place her there!" said the abbess.

The nuns began to force Frances towards the bed, but she cried out for help, and, pinioned as her hands were, she still managed to give them a good deal of trouble to get her along. By dint of violence, however, they were pretty sure to succeed, and they forced her to the side of the bed.

"Help! help!" she cried. "Oh, is there no help?"

"None!"

"Oh, is this possible, that of all here there is not one human heart that can feel for me? What is it you would do? At least, tell me what I have to expect."

The abbess made a gesture with her head, and the nuns flung Frances violently on to the bed.

"No—no! Oh, God! mercy!" she cried. "What are you about to do?"

The abbess made another gesture, and then they turned her over on to her face, so that her cries were partially smothered. Then the abbess rose to her feet, and looking like a demon, and speaking with what we might well suppose would be the accent of one, she cried out—

"Do your duty. Quick—quick! Kill her! kill her!"

Some half dozen of the nuns who were not holding the novice down upon the bed nearest to the abbess lifted the other one, and placed it upon her in a moment. A smothered shriek came from the girl.

It was not till that instant of time that Claude Duval felt perfectly sure of what they were about to do; but then there was no doubt but that the intention was actually to smother her between the two feather beds.

So monstrous an act might well stagger any one who saw it in contemplation; and for the space of time you might have counted four in, Claude Duval was petrified with horror and amazement. Then with one dash of his hand he flung the door of the confessional wide open, and with a spring that brought him into the midst of the nuns, he appeared before the astonished eyes of the abbess and the hags of nuns.

"Hold, wretches!" he shouted in a voice of thunder. "Hold, I say! I will not see this vile murder done!"

Jack, Dick Turpin, and Mr. Field, were by his side now in a moment, and they each had a pistol in their hands ready for use.

It would be quite impossible for any pen to adequately describe the consternation of the abbess and the nuns at the unexpected appearance in the midst of them in this most extraordinary manner of four well-armed and resolute men. The effect for the moment was perfectly overpowering.

Before, however, the abbess or any one could speak, or even had time to think of what to do, Claude had laid hold of the corner of the upper feather-bed and drawn it off the novice, crying out as he did so—

"Rise, Frances—rise; you are saved! you are saved!"

The young girl uttered piercing shrieks, for she had but the moment before been under the full and perfect impression that she was doomed to the horrible death from which it did not seem possible that any human agency could now save her.

The scene of confusion that ensued was positively awful. The old nuns who had assembled at the call of their villanous abbess, and who had evidently exulted in the act of cruelty and murder that had been so purposely attempted to be carried out in all its horrors, fled along the chapel in all directions.

At first, Dick Turpin was for intercepting them in their flight, but Claude Duval called out him—

"Let the hags go, Dick—let them go."

"Yes," said Jack, "and a good riddance too."

The few lights that had cast some sort of radiance upon the scene were, with one exception, knocked down and extinguished, and when Claude Duval, after placing Frances in the arms of Jack, made a spring over the two beds that were on the floor, in order to catch hold of the abbess, for he thought it expedient to take her prisoner, at all events, he found that it was not so easy a thing to do as he had anticipated.

With a scream of rage, such as might well have come from the throat of some wild animal from whom its prey had been but nearly snatched, the abbess produced from somewhere in her apparel, where she had it hidden, a dagger, and just as Claude Duval was upon the point of seizing her by the arm, she raised it, and made a plunge at his heart with it, crying out as she did so—

"Wretch! take the reward of your interference. Death—death, at least, to you! and then, let who will take my life, I shall, at least, feel that I am avenged."

It was fortunate that the flash of the keen and highly-polished blade of the dagger shone in the eyes of Claude Duval for a moment; and he was able to swerve on one side, so that the blade only inflicted a slight wound on his shoulder.

This swerving, though, had the effect of freeing the abbess from the slight hold he had got of her; and so, without pausing there a moment to see if she had inflicted any serious injury upon him or not, she dropped the dagger, and turning, she flew up the steps of the altar, and disappeared behind it in a moment.

Claude Duval heard the snap of the spring of the little secret door at the back of the altar in a moment; and he did not doubt but that she had taken good care to fasten it on the other side.

"Are you hurt, Claude?" said Dick.

"Oh, no—no."

"But she has escaped?"

"Never mind her; let her go. It would have been a very difficult matter to know what to do with her if I had taken her prisoner; so, after all, perhaps it is better that she has really got away. Where are the nuns?"

"Oh, they have all disappeared somewhere."

"Then we are masters of the field of battle, I suppose?"

"It looks like it, certainly. No one seems to be here to dispute a supremacy."

"Victory! victory!" cried Claude.

Hearing the cry of victory from the lips of Claude Duval, the young novice stepped forward from the confessional, and with eager joy embraced Frances, who really was so much astonished and bewildered by what had taken place that she looked around her, as if she feared that, after all, the seeming deliverance that she had had from the murderous abbess would turn out to be nothing but a delusion.

"You are saved!—you are saved, Frances!" said Alicia. "Do you not know that you are saved from death?"

"Are you Alicia?"

"Yes; and here is Helen. Do you not know us?"

"Oh, yes—yes!"

The young girl could control her feelings no longer, but burst into a complete passion of tears, so that they had great difficulty in calming her at all.

"Never mind her tears," said Jack. "You may depend upon it that there is nothing that will recover her more rapidly and readily than they."

"Yes," said Claude; "let her weep."

Dick Turpin now set about lighting one or two of the other lights about the chapel; for they were in such a state of semi-darkness, that he feared the old nuns or the abbess might think it a good opportunity of attempting to do them some sort of mischief.

"What are you about, Dick?" said Claude. "Don't make such an illumination."

"I am afraid of being left in the dark," said Dick. "If they found we had only one light, perhaps it would not seem to them a very difficult thing to find some means of putting it out; but if there are half a dozen it will be quite a different affair. There, now, I think we shall be able to see what we are about."

The candles burnt up quickly, and as they did so, they shone upon rather a strange scene in that chapel.

There was Claude Duval and his friends, and there was young Mr. Field, and there was Alicia and the two novices and Frances, who still could hardly believe the evidence of her own senses to the effect that she was free, although she had left off weeping.

Upon the floor were the two mattresses that had been brought into the chapel for the horrible purpose of committing one of the most hideous of murders, and beside them lay, here and there, a veil and a rosary, which the old nuns had dropped in their flight, as they made so hasty a retreat from the place.

Close to the steps of the altar, too, was the seat of judgment which the abbess had occupied during the mock trial of Frances; and there lay, too, the dagger with which at the last moment she had tried to take the life of Duval.

"Well," said Dick Turpin as he looked around him, "I think, Claude, that this is about our most curious adventure."

"It is, Dick."

"Never mind that," said Jack. "Let us go."

"You are right Jack, we will go at once, for we have those now in our care whom we ought to take out of the danger of this place as quickly as possible."

With these words, Claude Duval approached Frances, and spoke kindly to her saying—

"You are now quite safe from the abbess, and your life will be protected by ours. What I wish to know of you is, if you are strong enough and sufficiently recovered from the shock you must have received to leave this place."

"Oh, yes—yes. It is the staying here that will drive me mad."

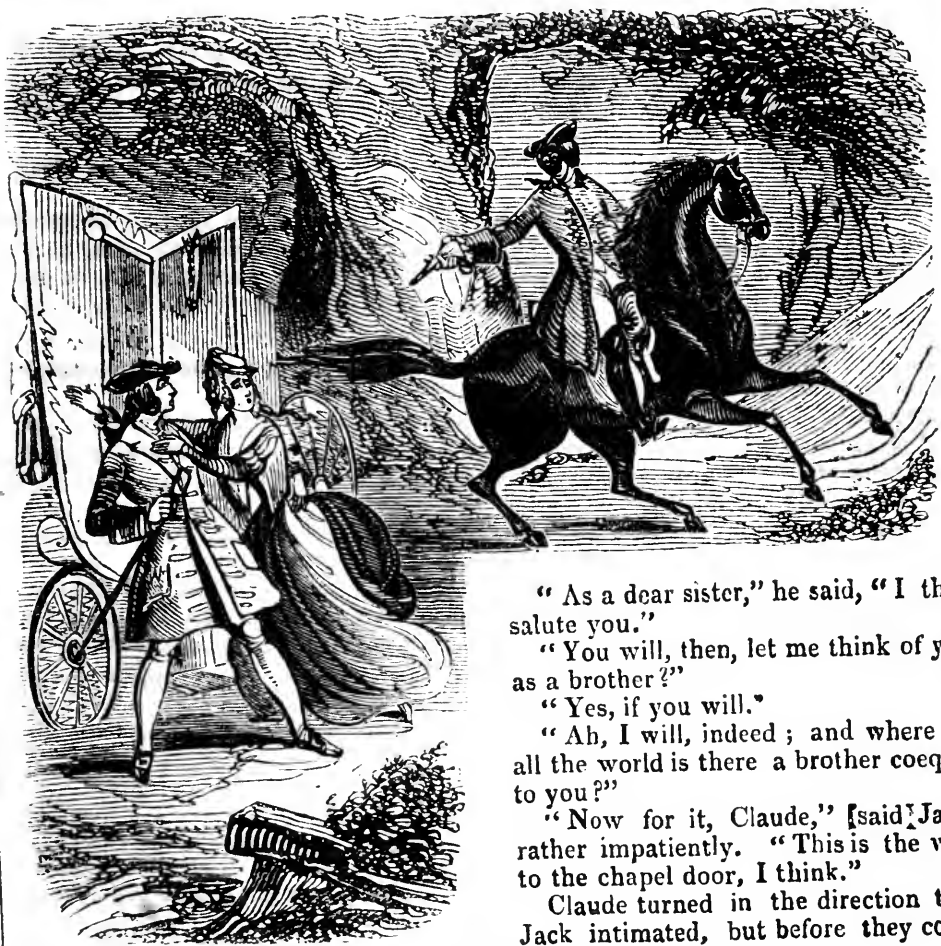
CHAPTER CCCLXXVIII.

DENNIS TRIES AN EXPERIMENT ON THE CREDULITY OF HUMAN NATURE.

"We are all ready," said Alicia, "Let us go at once."

Frances rose from the breast of Alicia, upon which she had been reposing, and approaching Claude Duval, she placed both her hands upon his arm, saying—

"You have saved me, sir, from such a death as is truly horrible to think of. Will you, oh, will you teach me how to thank you!"



"I am more than thanked."

"No, no. If all my life I were to try to do you kindness—if I pray for you while I have breath to do so, I cannot hope to repay this great, this deep and lasting obligation."

"I pray you to say no more about it," said Claude. "It is of little moment, I assure you. Don't speak of it."

Frances was really a very beautiful girl, and it was by quite a momentary impulse now, and with perfect innocence of purpose, that Claude Duval placed his arm for a moment around her and kissed her.

"As a dear sister," he said, "I thus salute you."

"You will, then, let me think of you as a brother?"

"Yes, if you will."

"Ah, I will, indeed; and where in all the world is there a brother coequal to you?"

"Now for it, Claude," said Jack, rather impatiently. "This is the way to the chapel door, I think."

Claude turned in the direction that Jack intimated, but before they could any of them move a step, a loud, bawling voice cried out—

"Oh, bedad! and isn't this the joy of poor Dennis's heart! Do I look at my master, or don't I? Oh, the saints be good to us all! and haven't I been grieving about him, till I thought I hadn't any eyes left in me head wid crying. Oh, master—master, don't you know your faithful Dennis, who has had so many adventures in the search after you, that they have been enough to make all the hair drop off his head? Bedad! then, I feel as if I had come into my ancestors' property in ould Ireland again, now that I see you, sir."

With this congratulatory speech, of the sincerity of which the reader, from his previous knowledge of Dennis's proceedings, is able to come to so good an opinion, Dennis had the impudence to come from behind the altar, and to walk down the steps of it as if nothing were at all amiss, and as if he had only to make a few professions of regard for his master and his friends to put himself again upon capital terms with him.

"Why, it's Dennis," said Dick.

"Dennis, by all that's abominable!" said Mr. Field.

"Yes, sir," said Dennis, "it is, sure enough, your own faithful Dennis, who is willing, the saints be praised, to follow you, sir, to life or death."

"Of the latter proposition I have no doubt," said Mr. Field.

"Many thanks to you, sir, for not doubting your faithful Dennis, and, bedad! now I look about me, here are all our old friends, sir. Oh, then, it's the joy of my heart, that is ready to come right out of my eyes, sir, and to go rolling down my nose and my cheeks, to see you wid such a good company, sir."

Claude looked at Dick and Jack, and they both looked at him, and then Duval said—

"Can impudence go further than this?"

"Impossible," said Dick.

"Wait a bit," said Jack, "there is some plan in all this."

"Think you so?"

"I do, indeed."

"But what?"

"My opinion is, that this rascal is sent by the abbess."

"Ah!"

"Yes; so it will be just as well to look to him well."

"It will—it will. Mr. Field?"

"Yes, my friend?"

Claude Duval whispered his suspicions in Mr. Field's ear, at the same time advising him to humour Dennis a little, in order to get out of him, if possible, what was the diabolical scheme of which he was to be the abject tool.

"I will," said Field. "Well, Dennis?"

"Yes, your honour? Oh, then, it gives me quite a joy all around my true, innocent heart, sir, to hear you speak again in this world."

"Come here, Dennis."

"Yes, sir; it's myself that will come. Oh, the holy! oh——"

"What's the matter?"

"It's the eyes of me that are forced to go on winking like nothing at all, at all, at the sight of all these young beauties, sir. Bedad! and where, sir, did all these lovely young females, sir, come from?"

"Never mind that, Dennis. I want to know where you came from?"

"Where I came from, sir?"

"Yes."

"Well, sir, I thought you would want to know."

"You thought right."

"Then, sir, I'm mightily glad I am right, sir; for it ain't often, sir, that a poor fellow is right when he is with all this quality, sir."

"But how came you here?" said Claude.

"How came I here, sir?"

"Yes."

"After the master, sir; at the same time, sir, it's mighty glad I am to see your own good-looking face, sir, to the face. And it's a fine looking man you are, sir. Sure, and the girls, sir, have been pulling caps about you where you come from, sir, no doubt. Master, don't you think, sir, that it would be as well to get out of this place?"

"Better than well, Dennis. Can you show us the way?"

"Well, sir, then I can."

"That's it," whispered Jack to Claude.

"What?"

"He will lead us all into some danger by order of the abbess."

"Hush!"

"Well, Dennis," said Mr. Field, "if you can show us the way out of this place, we shall be much indebted to you."

"Well, sir, then, it's the oddest thing in the whole world, sir, that I can do so at all—at all; but you see, sir, just in an accidental kind of way I do know the way out; and if you will all follow me, ladies and gentlemen, I will lead you fair and easy away."

"Go on, Dennis."

"This was, sir—this way."

Dennis went to a corner of the chapel, and opened with a key that he had in his hand a secret door, and pointing through it, he said—

"Now, sir, pray go on—all of you pray go on, and it's myself that will follow you, sir."

"And where does that lead to?"

"To the garden, sir."

"Very good, then, Dennis; you will go first."

"Me, sir?"

"Yes, you."

"Oh! but, sir, where would be my manners to go first, sir, I'd like to be after knowing? Oh, no, sir, it's myself that will follow the quality. You have nothing to do, sir, but to go straight on, and you will find, the saints be good to us, it's all right."

Claude whispered to Jack and Dick; and one of them placed himself on one side of Dennis, and the other on the other. Claude Duval himself stepped up to him behind, so that Dennis was environed completely, if we count the open door as one side of the four.

"Now, Dennis," said Claude, "we have that respect for you that we insist upon your going first."

"Me, sir?"

"Yes, you. So you had better go at once without any further bother about it. We will follow you."

"But it's all right, sir."

"We know that, and so we will follow you. Do you think for a moment that we would follow you if it were not all right?"

"But, sir, I—that is—you——"

"Go on, Dennis."

"But, sir—master, I don't want to go first. I'm only a poor sort of fellow, you know, sir; and, bedad! I'd rather not go first. Master, will you speak to the gentlemen, sir, an it please you, sir?"

"No, Dennis; I insist upon your going first."

"Then, sir, I won't! I ain't very well, sir. Let me go, gentlemen. I don't feel very well. I want to go away altogether, sir, if you please. Oh!—oh! murder!"

Claude Duval caught Dennis by the back of the neck as he tried to make a bolt past Jack, and held him firmly.

"You scoundrel!" he said, "you shall go whether you like it or not."

"Murder! murder!"

By one of those efforts of strength which Claude Duval sometimes astonished people with, he fairly, by the aid of both his hands, lifted Dennis off his feet, and flung him with terrible force head-foremost through the open door into the obscurity and complete darkness beyond.

There was one loud scream from Dennis just as Duval threw him, and then, to the surprise of them all, they did not hear him fall; but in about three or four seconds there was a faint cry, as if far away in the very bowels of the earth.

They all looked at each other in amazement.

"What is the meaning of that?" said Dick.

"I can guess," said Jack.

"And so can I," said Claude. "Get one of the candles, Jack."

Jack run to one of the candles that were lighted at one of the little shrines of the chapel, and soon brought it to the spot.

"Don't be rash, Claude," he said.

"No, no; trust me for that. I will be more than careful."

As he spoke, Claude Duval stood upon the very threshold of the little open door through which he had projected Dennis, and, stretching out his arm with the candle, he looked beyond it.

The mystery was at once explained.

Beyond the door there was no flooring at all, but a deep chasm, down which Dennis had gone, and down which the party now in safety in the chapel would, no doubt, have gone, if they had but allowed Dennis to be the last one of the lot, for, no doubt, if any difficulty had arisen he would have made a rush at them, and, so taking them by surprise, have precipitated Duval, his friends, and his master, down the chasm.

After that, the young girls would have been an easy prey to the abbess and the old nuns, who, no doubt, were waiting with some eagerness the result of the diabolical experiment.

"It's all over with Dennis," said Claude, as he drew back.

"How so?" said Mr. Field.

"Look!"

Claude handed him the light, and as Duval had done, he, too, took a cautious look through the open door, and then he turned away with a shudder.

"It is, indeed, all over with him."

"No man more richly merited the fate he has come to," said Dick.

"And may all such so perish," said Jack. "He was the very worst of traitors, for he betrayed the hand that fed him."

Jack closed the door, and they shrunk from the very vicinity of it. Then Claude Duval said in a clear voice—

"Take good care of these young ladies, and follow me. I will not remain another minute willingly in this most odious place."

CHAPTER CCCLXXIX.

THE DEPARTURE FROM THE CHAPEL, AND THE MYSTERIES OF THE GARDEN.

ALICIA hung upon the arm of Mr. Field, and they followed Claude Duval closely. After them came the three young girls, and Dick and Jack, each with a loaded pistol in his hand, brought up the rear of the little party.

Claude Duval and his friends were quite clearly in that frame of mind that it was not likely they would stop at trifles in effecting their escape from the convent. The atrocious attempts that had been made not only upon their own lives but upon the lives of the innocent and beautiful girls who were with them, had certainly had the effect of enraging Claude and his friends beyond all endurance; and if any of the old nuns or the abbess had come in their way, it is very likely that they would hardly have stopped to consider whether their sex gave them any particular claim to mercy.

There was a look about the face of Duval which let Jack see, for he knew him well, that his patience and temper had been tried to the very utmost by the events that had taken place in the convent.

Proceeding along the aisles of the chapel, Claude reached a kind of transcept, at one end of which was an arched door, which had evidently been designed by the architect of the place to be the principal mode of egress and ingress from the chapel.

This door was securely and elaborately bolted, but it did not present any apparent obstacle to getting it open, till all the bolts, and there were five in number, were withdrawn, and then there was evidently some hindrance to its opening which Claude at the instant could not detect.

There was no lock.

"Confound the door," said Claude, "I don't know what is the matter with it. Just come and look to it, Jack. You, I know, comprehend these things."

Jack stepped forward, and by the aid of one of the lights, he carefully examined the door, and then he said—

"I have it, Claude. Don't you see that there is a long iron pin here down the side, which holds it all the way by a kind of lip, that just comes over it ?"

"Ah, yes ; what are we to do ?"

"Hold the light. Dick, have you the crow-bar ?"

"It is here."

"That will do."

With the crow-bar, that had already been of such use to them, Jack tapped the long piece of iron, till he found a part of it that returned a much duller sound than the rest.

"This is the spot to try it," he said.

There were few persons who could wrench with a crow-bar with greater skill than Sixteen-string Jack, and now he managed to place it in such a position that the long piece of iron gave a sharp crack and flew aside upon its hinges; for it was hinged all the way like the locking pilastres that are now so fasionable to pedestal chests of drawers.

"That's it," said Jack. "There is a secret spring that held it, and which if we had known the way to act upon it, no doubt would have moved the iron rim at once. I have broken it, though, so our end is answered."

Upon Duval trying the door, now, it opened at once, although rustily, upon its hinges, for it had evidently not been used for a very long time indeed.

"Oh—on," said Duval, as he forced the door open. "I will get through every obstacle to liberty out of this place, the very atmosphere of which, if depressing."

There was quite a gush of cold air upon their faces as they went out of the chapel. Immediately outside the door was a little portico with a dome top, and beyond that they found half a dozen stone steps, that led at once into the garden.

"Bravo!" said Dick, "all's right now."

"I don't koow that," said Jack.

"Why, what have we to be afraid of? I think that, honestly speaking, we are a match for the abbess and all the nuns, if they were to have the folly and the temerity to attack us."

"That they will not do, but I am thinking of what the abbess told Claude about there being only one path through the garden, in consequence of the spring-guns and the steel-traps that were in it."

"Oh, I don't believe a word of that."

"I am glad to hear you say so. What do you think of it, Duval? We are talking of the danger of the garden."

"We can't help it," said Claude. "I should say come on, and don't heed the one half, or the whole of the abbess's story about the may-be romance."

They were all very well pleased to hear that Claude Duval, whom they looked upon as rather a high authority, had such an opinion regarding the dangers of the garden, for the novices as well as Alicia had during their residence at the convent been duly informed of those dangers.

There was one particular portion of the convent garden only, the whole of which was, not without reason, supposed to be within the view of some window of the house from which the abbess could look, in which the novices were allowed to walk; but they had been told that if they ventured to go beyond that spot they would encounter such injuries as would be to them a source of pain and suffering while they might exist.

Claude Duval, though, took a very common-sense view of this matter; and, in the first place, he thought that the abbess said too much about the dangers of the garden for them to be real; and, in the second place, he knew how difficult it would be to maintain anything like such machinery for injuring people, as she would fain make others believe was there, in anything like a good state of repair.

Spring-guns require constantly reloading and looking to—spring-traps get rusty and fall to pieces; so, taking one thing with another, Duval was much inclined to think that the abbess drew rather largely upon her imagination for her facts, or pretended facts, concerning the dangers of the convent garden.

With such impressions, then, he resolved to take the shortest route he could to liberty with those who were entrusted to his care.

"This way," he said. "Keep close to me. Come on—come on. Why, there is daylight enough for us to see well."

"There is, indeed," said Jack.

"Claude—Claude," said Dick, "I don't know if you know it, but the fact is, you are going, to my judgment, dir ectly the contrary way to the lodge entrance at the corner of the lane."

"I know it."

"Then I have no more to say."

"Allow me to explain that, during my researches in the garden, I saw that there was a door in the wall. It was of iron, to my thinking, but it has, no doubt, a lock, and that will be as easily found as the lock of a wooden door. My object is to take you to that door in the wall, and to let Jack try his skill upon it."

"I will," said Jack.

"Of one thing," added Claude, "we may he assured, and that is, that the fastenings of the doors, be they what they may, are on this side; so I cannot for a moment think that they can be any very insurmountable obstacles to our proceeding."

"They cannot, indeed," said Jack; "and it is infinitely better to leave the place by such means than by the ordinary lodge entrance."

While this little discourse was going on Claude had proceeded not very rapidly, but easily and steadily, along the path of the garden which seemed most likely to lead him in the direction he wanted.

The early dawn was just casting its cold, grey light upon the tops of the old trees in the place, and the birds were beginning to awaken from their slumbers.

A rather keen, fresh air was blowing; but that was rather delightful after the vivid recollection they all had of the direful and unwholesome vapours they had had to encounter in the dismal vaults of the convent.

Claude Duval was beginning quite to congratulate himself upon the fact that the abbess had only spoken, as she had done of the dangers of the garden, to frighten him and others, when a circumstance occurred which gave rather a new turn to his thoughts.

As he went on he was rather surprised to see lying in his pathway a quantity of dry twigs, which appeared to be scattered too artfully to be the product of chance.

Duval paused a moment, but only for a moment, and so very brief was the pause that it could hardly be observed by those who followed him. He did not say anything; but, planting one foot firmly on the ground, he advanced the other, when, to his astonishment, the moment he hurled aside one of the pieces of wood, the whole fell with a crash, revealing the fact that there was a pit of about fifteen or twenty feet in depth, which was just the width of the path, and which had been loosely covered over by wood, and the debris of the garden, for the purpose of making it appear to be all level ground.

"Hold!" cried Claude.

"What is amiss?" said Mr. Field.

"Nothing particular."

Mr. Field got to the brink of the pit, and gazed at it with surprise.

"Why, what can this mean?"

"Only a little trap in which to catch any one who might happen to come this way, that is all; but, as we have avoided it, why it don't matter to us now. I am rather surprised that the abbess could think it possible that any one would be taken in by such an obvious arrangement."

"She relied upon night favouring the delusion," said Dick.

"The fall would, no doubt," said Jack, "have inflicted such injury as to make capture certain."

"No doubt of that," said Claude. "It would be difficult to fall into a hole like that and avoid a broken or a sprained limb; so that then her ladyship could come at her leisure and take what sort of vengeance she liked upon the interloper."

"Even so," said Alicia. "I have heard her say that there were deep holes in the grounds that went far down into the very centre of the earth."

Claude laughed at this extensive idea of Alicia's about the pitfall going to the centre of the earth, and he said—

"Without going so far as that; it goes, no doubt, quite far enough for mischief. I think, though, that now we know what are the descriptions of danger in the place, we may very well guard against them."

As he spoke, he tore from a tree close at hand rather a long jagged bough, and determined to use it to test the stability of the ground as he went on.

A very slight deviation from the path enabled them to get past the spot where the pit was; and they went on in safety for some time. The morning light, which each moment increased, was certainly a very great aid to them, so that, after all, as Alicia said—

"Everything is for the best. We were agrieved at the many delays which the destructive spirit of the abbess placed in our way when we were trying to leave the convent, and now we find that the effect of all those delays has been just to give us daylight to find our way in, and that, having such daylight, we have avoided a fall into yonder pit."

"Even so," said Claude. "We never do know in this world, so short-sighted are we, as to what is to come, that which is good for us."

It was at this moment that the report of a gun being discharged came upon their ears, and a shower of leaves from a tree close at hand fell among them.

CHAPTER CCCLXXX.

THE ABBESS IS COMPELLED TO LET HER PREY ESCAPE HER AT LAST.

CLAUDE DUVAL did not allow himself for a moment to be put out of his way by this attack; for that it was an attack there could be no sort of doubt.

Drawing a pistol from his pocket, he just glanced around him, and made up his mind in which direction the shot had come, and then he fired.

The moment that he pulled the trigger of the pistol, he called out—

"Forward—forward! now, quickly, before there is time to fire a second shot at us. Follow me, and depend upon my leading you all right. Ah! there is the gate in the wall. Jack?"

"Yes, Claude?"

"Run on before, and open the gate. We will follow you. Do you see it?"

"I do."

Jack ran on to the wall which had just become visible between two trees, and there, sure enough, was the little low-arched iron door that Duval had spoken of to his friends.

That it was the abbess herself who had fired the gun at the party, but who had been foiled in doing them any harm, owing to the abundant character of the vegetation about that spot, Duval did not doubt. His only hope now was, that she might not know exactly how to load the gun again, or that if she did, she might not have the means at hand to do so.

A glance from Claude to Dick let the latter see that he thought the present danger rather great; and so, indeed, it was, for if the abbess were to make an apearance and fire with shot at the party, the odds were very greatly in favour of her hitting somebody; and it would have been a hard case, indeed, if any of the young girls had been killed or badly wounded at the moment of escape, after passing through so many of the dangers of the convent.

"Jack," cried Claude, "how do you get on?"

"It is an old lock."

"Can you pick it?"

"No, Claude."

"Then force it, Jack; for, on my honour, I don't think that there is any time to spare."

"The deuce there isn't!" said Jack.

When Claude said such a thing as that Jack felt quite certain that he had good cause for haste; so, taking the crowbar in his hand, Jack plunged the fine flat end of it between the door and the wall, and by a powerful effort of leverage, burst the door open.

"All's right," he cried.

"Thank Heaven!" said Claude. "Mr. Field?"

"Yes—yes."

"Take the ladies out of the garden. Quick—quick!"

"At once—at once!"

"No!" cried a voice. "Too late!"

Claude turned in the direction the voice proceeded from, and just emerging from amid a clump of trees that grew on one side of a narrow gravelled path he saw the abbess, with a short carbine in her hands, which she levelled at the party.

"Stir one step, any of you, and I fire!" she cried.

"Stop!" said Claude.

"Ha! ha! you are in my power!" said the abbess.

Claude gave Dick a look, and then they both placed themselves before the terrified girls, so that if the abbess were to fire, they would intercept the shots; and then Duval said to her with great coolness—

"Madam, I am loth to take the life of a woman; but I swear to you that if you do not depart at once, and cease to annoy us, I will forget that your sex claims my consideration, and kill you as I would a mad dog."

"Base words!" said the abbess—"base words; but I well know my danger, and I likewise well know my resources."

"You had better leave us."

"No! I know that this establishment cannot subsist after what has happened here to-night; and after what you and your myrmidons are cognisant of, I know that you will denounce this house, and that the evil spirit of the English laws, which are not made to favour Catholicism, will be down upon me and mine. I care not to outlive the ruin of this house."

"Rash woman, you know not what you say."

"I know well what you say, and my whole and sole object is not to die quite unavenged. In this death-dealing carbine I hold the lives of several of you. I only now gloat over the destruction I can at any moment hurl among you."

"You are mad."

"Perhaps I am—perhaps I have always been mad. I know I was mad to trust you, and be fooled by you as I was; but it was passion blinded me. I would have made you rich as any prince; but now that you have deceived me I will kill you."

"And do yourself no good."

"I care not."

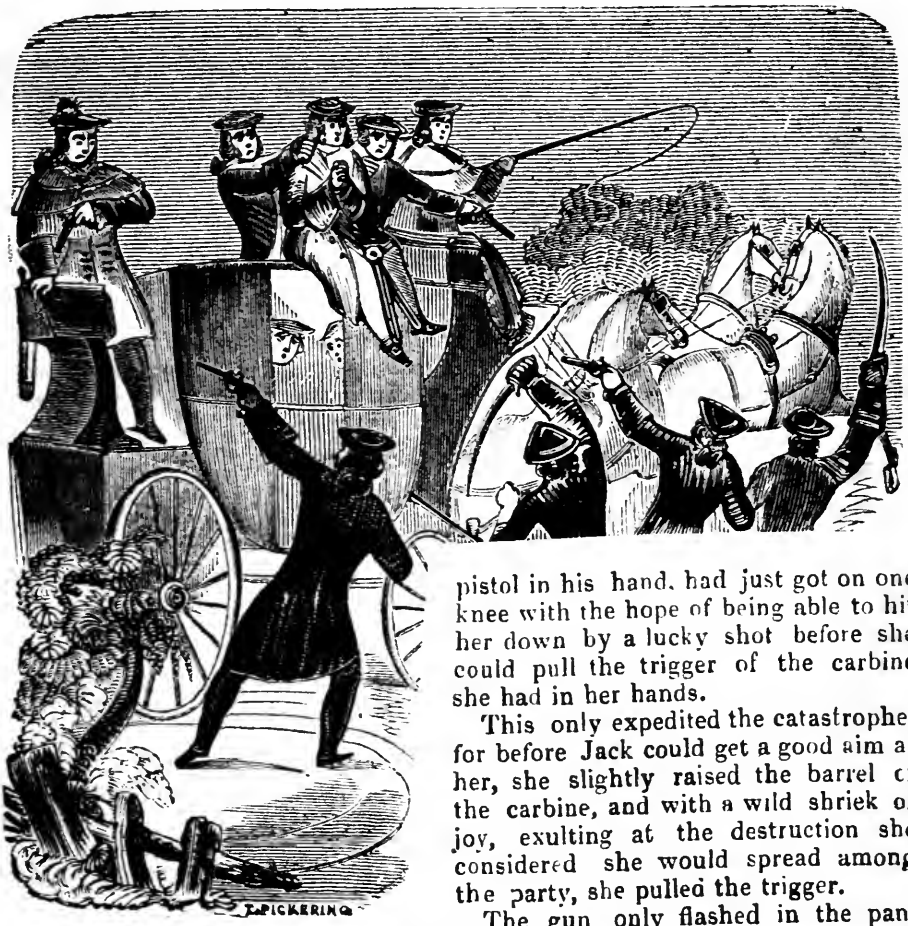
"Come, now, I will make conditions with you."

"I'll not believe you."

"Nay, why not?"

"I made a bargain with you, and you deceived me—shall I be twice a fool within twenty-four hours? No. I do not know who or what you are; but I think that you are some bold and skilful spy of the police. But whether you are or not, I am lost and ruined, and I will have revenge!"

"Dick," said Claude, "she will fire."



"Of course."

"If anything happens to me, Dick, leave me here."

"If I do, may I be—— Well, no matter."

"Ah!" cried the abbess, "I see you. It will not do. Die, all of you!"

What she had seen was Jack, who, dodging behind Dick and Claude with a pistol in his hand, had just got on one knee with the hope of being able to hit her down by a lucky shot before she could pull the trigger of the carbine she had in her hands.

This only expedited the catastrophe, for before Jack could get a good aim at her, she slightly raised the barrel of the carbine, and with a wild shriek of joy, exulting at the destruction she considered she would spread among the party, she pulled the trigger.

The gun only flashed in the pan, and Claude Duval and his friends were saved from what might have been a most serious calamity.

Duval drew a long breath, but he did not say a word. Advancing with a pistol in his hand, he kept his eyes fixed upon the face of the abbess.

When she found that the carbine had missed fire, she had uttered such a cry, that any one would have thought she had really been wounded to the death.

Then casting the useless weapon to the ground, she seemed intent upon flying from the spot; but the steady gaze of Claude Duval evidently exercised a strange fascinating power over her, and there she remained staring at him as though she had been turned to stone.

Duval waved his arm when he got within about a dozen paces of her, and cried—

"Away—away, infamous woman! My duty to society, I know, is to secure you, and give you into the hands of the law, which for your numerous offences would most probably put you to death: but I have private obligations which press too much upon me at this time for me to do so. Away and repent, for soon you will have to answer both at an earthly and heavenly tribunal for your black and malignant life."

"Mercy!" she gasped.

"Away—away! Do not let me look upon that most awful sight that man can see—the fears of a wicked woman."

She shuddered, and stepped back pace after pace; but instead of taking the route among the trees as she had come, and as she, no doubt, intended to go, and thought she was going, she took the little path by the side of the thick vegetation.

"Away!" cried Claude, again.

"Mercy—mercy!" gasped the abbess. "Mercy! Oh, God!"

These were the last words she spoke, for, to the horror of Claude Duval, who did not look for such a catastrophe, that path into which she hurried in her absence of mind had in it one of the pitfalls similar to the one he, Duval, had escaped from.

The abbess trod upon the terrible ground, and with a piercing shriek she fell headlong backwards, and disappeared as if the earth of its own accord, or at the bidding of Heaven itself, had opened to receive her.

"She is gone, by Heaven!" said Claude.

The novices filled the air with shrieks of dismay, and it was with some difficulty that Mr. Field got them silent, so full of terror were they at the awful end of the abbess of the convent.

Dick and Jack both ran up to Duval, for they could not believe but what something serious must have happened to him at the moment.

"What is it?" said Dick.

"Yes, Claude," cried Jack, "where is the abbess?"

"Gone."

"Gone has she—but where?"

Claude pointed with his finger downwards, and then he said—

"She has gone into a grave of her own fashioning, Jack. Can you bear to look upon her?"

"Yes."

"I don't think I can. Hark!"

A strange and horrible wailing cry came upon their ears, and then a frightful scream, after which all was still as the grave itself.

"This is horrible," said Dick.

"I cannot bear it," said Jack. "Oh, come away."

"No—no," said Claude Duval, "it looks cowardly to leave even such a woman as the abbess of the convent in the awful position she may be in. We are men, after all, and it is our duty to go to her aid. Come with me, both of you; Mr. Field will look to the ladies for a minute or two. Will you come?"

"Yes," said Dick.

"I will follow you," said Jack.

Upon this Duval, although he absolutely shuddered as he did so, strode forward to the little pathway, about six paces down which the abbess had met with such a fearful catastrophe. Arriving at the edge of the pit he cast a glance down it, and then turning to his two friends, he just said—

"Look."

They did look, and turned away pale and aghast.

The infernal ingenuity of the abbess had placed at the bottom of that pit a terrible machine of iron, with spikes about the length of sword blades sticking up from it, so that whoever might fall into the pit could hardly avoid being pierced through by them. That dreadful fate that she had intended for others she had met herself. She lay at the bottom of the pit quite transfixed by some of the spikes, and fast bleeding to death, although, as Claude looked down, he saw some slight movement of one of her arms as he thought, but he was not quite sure of that.

For a moment or two, neither Claude nor his two friends spoke, and then it was Dick who said—

"On your soul, Claude, tell me. do you think anything can be done for that woman? for, if so, I will scramble down the sides of the pit in some sort of way."

"No," said Claude. "No—and yet—"

"Yet what?"

"It would be a mercy to send a bullet through her brain."

"She is dead," said Jack. "I have taken a second look. Come away, and rest content, Claude, with the fact that she is dead."

"I am glad to think that it is so," said Claude. "One would not have such a woman as that suffer."

"Certainly not."

"Come away—come away," said Dick. "At all events, it is a gracious thought for us that she come by her death by an act every way her own, and with which we had nothing to do."

"You are right there," said Claude Duval. "I would not have had that woman's death upon my conscience for any money."

"Nor I."

"It will be better," said Claude, "to say nothing of the fearful state in which we have seen the abbess to the ladies."

"Certainly not, Claude," said Dick. "Which of us, I wonder, would like to set about describing to them such a scene?"

"Not I," said Jack.

"Nor I," said Claude. "So now come on, and I for one shall breathe a little more freely when I have left this terrible abode. The death of the abbess, I think, almost absolves us, does it not, from the necessity of any further interference with Berrymead Priory or its inhabitants?"

"It does, to my thinking," said Dick, "for some time to come, at the least."

CHAPTER CCCLXXXI.

GENTLEMAN JACK HAS HIS LAST ADVENTURE.

While this little examination into the condition of the abbess of the convent was going on upon the part of Claude and of his two friends, Dick and Jack, Mr. Field had very properly and prudently taken the ladies through the little iron door in the wall into the lane, that ran along by the outside of the wall of the garden.

There they were not only tolerably safe from any further attacks upon the part of the convent authorities, but they were out of hearing of anything that might have a tendency to increase the condition of alarm into which they had been thrown.

Upon Claude and his two friends seeking them, the novices and Alicia looked as though they would have been glad to have received some information regarding what had taken place in the garden that had seemed so alarming, and Claude thought it was better to say something than to leave them entirely to their own conjectures upon the subject.

"Rest contented," he said, "as regards two things—one is, that the lady abbess of the convent will trouble you no more; and the other is, that none of us have her death to answer for, in any shape or way whatever."

These words were sufficient to let the novices know that their great enemy was no more, at the same time that they did not have the effect of inducing any belief that he who had been so true a friend to them had found it necessary or politic to have the death of that abandoned and truly horrible female to answer for.

A feeling of great relief came over all their minds at this assurance, and they were content, or seemed to be content with the amount of information they then possessed, and did not seek for more.

This was so far satisfactory, then, to Claude Duval, that he felt the whole affair, as regarded the convent of Berrymead, had assumed an aspect that would not make it necessary for him, or Dick, or Jack, to interfere further in it.

"Now, Mr. Field," he said, "here we are in the open air, and I think we may take upon ourselves to say, that we have nothing further to do with the building that lies within this gloomy wall."

"I hope not, indeed."

"You," continued Claude, "can make your own arrangements regarding Alicia, and for what my friends and I have been able to do, I have only one favour to ask."

"What is that?"

"It is, that you will charge yourself with the care of these young ladies, and see that they reach their friends in safety."

"Most cheerfully will I do so; and I will promise even more than that, for if it should so happen that the bigotry of any of their friends should be so great that they hesitate to receive them in the manner one may wish, I and Alicia will offer them a home with us, for it will be quite impossible we should ever forget the mutual aid and assistance, and the common dangers we have all passed through together upon this eventful night, that is now with the past."

It was quite impossible that Mr. Field could have said anything else which would have given Claude Duval more satisfaction than this, for it at once relieved him of what, to him, might have been the most awkward part of the whole adventure, namely, the care of the young girls who had been rescued from the convent.

Turning to Dick and Jack, Claude said in an undertone—

"We have but to get our horses now, and to bid adieu to these kind friends, with whom we have been associated in this adventure."

Dick and Jack at once assented to this view of the affair; but it happened that Claude Duval had not spoken in so low a tone but that Mr. Field had heard him, so stepping up to him, he said—

"Duval, can you spare me a few moments of your time?"

"With pleasure: what would you say?"

Mr. Field led him a little in advance of the party, and then with an air and manner of evident emotion, he said to him—

"Do you think, that after all you have done for me and mine, I can possibly think of parting with you thus? Do you think that I have no heart, and that I do not feel deeply to its inmost core what I owe to you?"

"I never thought any such thing," said Duval.

"Then let me tell you that I feel such gratitude towards you, that all I possess is at your behest. I pray you to desert the mode of life you are now engaged in, and induce your two friends to do so likewise. Come, then, with me, and with Alicia, and we will provide a home for you. What I propose is, that we all reside together."

Claude shook his head.

"Nay, do not put a negative upon the matter. Alicia and I quite understand each other regarding it, and have briefly spoken of it together."

Again Duval shook his head doubtingly.

"You have not heard all that I have to say," added Mr. Field. "Will you listen to me with patience?"

"I will."

"Then, Claude Duval, what I propose is just this, that we—that is, Alicia and I—purchase an estate some way in the country, and that we and such of the novices as may want a temporary or a permanent home, reside there with you and your two friends. We shall all be far enough removed from popular observation for you to be safe along with your two associates; and as by the course of time the memory of your deeds will by your non-appearance in public grow faint, so will your sense of security be all the greater; and you will, at least, feel that there is no danger, even if you were inclined to mingle a little with the great world again."

Claude Duval was silent for a few moments; and it was evident that the proposition so kindly made by Mr. Field had greatly affected him. When he spoke again, it was in a very different tone of voice to any that he had hitherto used.

"Mr. Field," he said, "if, not very long ago, this proposition had been made to me, I should have accepted it."

"But why not now?"

"I will tell you."

"Yes; but I hope to conquer your scruples."

"Listen: there was one whom I loved, but she is now with the dead. From that time my heart has become, as it were, a barren waste; and I can know no peace but in the wild excitements of the life I lead, or in the grave!"

"Do not say so!"

"It is the truth; so urge me no more. I will find you out and see you now and then, when I can do so without the chance of casting a slur upon your fair fame with the world, by letting it seem that you have such an acquaintance as Claude Duval, the highwayman. And now, if you would really be kind to me, you will say no more upon this subject."

After such a speech as that from Claude Duval, of course it was quite out of the question that Mr. Field should further urge his argument; so he merely bowed and said—

"Your wishes shall be laws to me."

"Nay, now," said Duval, as he held out his hand, "do not let us feel any coolness towards each other, or disagreement upon this matter. Let me have the satisfaction of knowing that I still have in you a friend."

"You have—you have, indeed!" said Field, as he wrung the hand of Claude Duval. "You have in me a friend, and you ever will!"

There could be very little doubt but that Alicia and Dick and Jack understood pretty well what was passing between Claude Duval and Mr. Field; but they said not a word when they both slackened their pace and allowed the party to come up with them.

Duval looked tolerably cheerful; and the little party in a short space of time reached the spot where Claude and his friends had left their horses. There was then a strange kind of gloom on the whole of them; and Duval, as he patted the neck of his steed, said with a voice of feeling—

"Ladies, I and my friends will bid you good-day at this point of your plans. Mr. Field will take every possible care of you, I know; and I can only say that it will be your own faults if ever you enter a convent again; and that I wish you all good husbands as soon as possible. Come on, Jack."

Claude sprang upon his horse; and, as his friends were already mounted, they all three were ready for the road.

"Now," said Claude, in a whisper, "let us be off as soon as we can, for the longer we stay here the more painful will be the parting upon both sides."

"Let's cry out good-by, then," said Dick, "and gallop off."

"No—no," said Jack. "Not that—not that. We ought to shake hands with all the novices before we go; so, Dick, don't be over-hasty."

"As you please."

"Jack was always very gallant to the ladies," said Claude with a smile.

This hand-shaking that Jack was so anxious about was gone through very tearfully by the young girls, who considered that they were so much beholden to Claude and his friends that it was impossible to bid them adieu without emotion.

"We shall meet again, surely?" said Frances.

Claude bowed and smiled faintly.

"Ah, you do not mean it, then?"

"Yes, I do. I hope that we shall meet again, and it shall not be my fault if we do not. Farewell."

With these words, Claude gave his horse a slight hint to go on, and as he went off at rather a sharp trot, Dick and Jack had no resource but to go after him. They let him precede them because they wished that he should go just where his fancy might lead him, and they could guess very well that in the state of mind he was in he could not, for some little time, be very much in the cue for conversation upon any subject.

Rather to their surprise, for they thought he would have gone towards London, Claude turned his horse's head countrywise, and fairly rode past Berrymead Priory again.

They could none of them forbear from regarding those gloomy and suggestive walls with strange feelings as they rode past them, and even Claude Duval slackened his pace and turned his head to take a last look at the ivy-crowned walls within which had taken place such strange events.

This slight relaxation of speed upon the part of Claude brought both Dick and Jack up to him.

"Shall we ever," said Claude, in much his usual manner, "shall we ever see that place again inside, Dick?"

"I don't want."

"Nor I," said Jack.

"And, indeed, I don't; and yet when we come to reflect that there will be a new abbess, and new nuns, and new novices, we shall not be far wrong in coming to the conclusion that there will be fresh novices treated there of a not very dissimilar kind to those which have recently taken place."

"Then, Claude, if such be the case, we had better denounce the whole affair to the authorities."

"Probably Mr. Field," said Jack, "will feel it to be his duty to do that."

"It is likely."

"Well—well," said Claude, "come on—come on. We will take a canter to the first retired inn we meet with, and then have some breakfast and put up for a little while. I for one feel as if I wanted some rest, and I think that if we can lie by with anything like safety till sunset it will be well."

They all three trotted along the road abreast now, and so passed on through the villages of Ealing and Hanwell, crossing the little River Brent by a rustic bridge that was there at the period of our story.

About a couple of miles further on, situated in the midst of very picturesque and beautiful scenery, they came to an inn called "The Reindeer and Cup," and from the quiet and rusticated character of the place, so far as they could see, Claude thought it would do to stop at.

"What do you think of this house?" he said.

"It is the very thing for us," said Dick, "to all appearances."

"So I think."

"And so do I," said Jack. "We are all agreed."

"Then let us stop here and breakfast, and rest our cattle better than they could where we left them while we were at the convent. We will, if no cross-accident should occur to mar such a design, stay here till sunset, and then, old friends, I should say, let us to the road again!"

Jack and Dick were far from being averse to this proposition of Claude's, and after a glance at each other, Jack said—

"Yes, Claude. Let it be the road again, for I don't think that either you or I or Dick are in just the frame of mind to sit down quietly in any state of life, whatever might be its advantages."

"Certainly not," said Claude.

"I think with you both," said Dick. "Time was when I cherished the dream of one day making sufficient by this mode of life to go from it, and in peace and retirement and serenity pass the remainder of my days; but I have lived long enough to feel how fallacious is any such idea, and so I have completely abandoned it."

"We are all agreed, then," said Claude; "so to the last we shall be, what we have been so long, knights of the road. Here we are at the inn. It will be just as well that we ascertain what guests are here before we alight and allow ourselves to encounter a disadvantage."

CHAPTER CCCLXXXII.

THE "GUILDFORD CELERITY" IS OF ASSISTANCE TO CLAUDE DUVAL.

"HOUSE—house!" cried Dick. "House, here! Hilloa!"

At this upon outside the door of the inn, a man ran out in his shirt sleeves, and said in a hurried voice—

"Good Lord, gentlemen, what is the matter? You quite take my breath away."

"Where's the landlord?"

"I am the landlord, if it's all the same to you, gentlemen."

"Then what do you mean by saying that it almost takes your breath away to see three guests at your door?"

"Because, gentlemen, it is so early, that's all; but if you will only please to alight, you will find that there is here good accommodation for man and beast, as the sign says, which is now over the door; and though you might go to a place where you might find a finer looking room than I can show you, and more filigree nonsense, yet I don't think you could possibly go anywhere where you would find more comfort than there is here, gentlemen."

"What guests have you?"

"Guests, sir? Why, I do think I may take upon myself to say, sir, that we have three."

"Three, have you? Well, who and what are they? for, to tell the truth, we are a little particular where we put up."

"You can't do better, sir, than be particular, so I can set your mind at ease by saying, that the three guests I think I have—"

"You only think?"

"Yes, gentlemen. The three guests I think I have, are your three noble selves, for there is not another soul in the house, except me and my own family."

"This will do," said Dick to Claude.

"Exactly."

"The very thing," said Jack.

"Well, landlord, we will stay some hours with you. Open your stable door, and let us ride our horses into the stable yard. You will be so good as to give them the best breakfast you can, and likewise do the same by us."

"With all the pleasure in life, gentlemen," said the landlord, who was certainly rather an original. "With all the pleasure in life, I may say. A merciful man is merciful to his beast, and I like to hear you say you wish the cattle to have a good breakfast."

"We think as much of our steeds as it is possible to think of such creatures," said Claude.

A very short time sufficed for the horses to be comfortably bestowed, in three stalls, and for their masters to be seated at the breakfast-table of the landlord, which was tolerably well supplied with abundance of good things. The party consisted of the landlord, his wife, and his wife's sister; and Claude Duval, with his friends, were not long in discovering that there was something or another upon the mind of the whole party, against which they were struggling might and main.

That this something was a matter of grief to them, that Claude could guess, by the way in which the females caught their breath, now and then, as if they were repressing the desire to sob, and by the landlord, without any cause in the whole world, pretending now and then to be seized with an immense desire to sneeze

This pretended sneezing, Claude was sufficiently sharp-witted to see, arose from a desire to hide tears, that would at times force themselves into his eyes.

Claude looked at Dick, who gave him a short nod in return, as much as to say, "I understand you, and see with you that there is something or another sorely amiss in the family."

Jack, too, by the observant way in which he looked at the landlord's wife, was evidently alive to the fact of the mystery that was pending.

After a time, it was obvious that the uneasiness of the whole party was very much upon the increase, indeed, and that, as they looked at a clock that was in the room, their pent-up feelings amounted to quite an agony.

At length the clock struck eight.

At that moment, the landlady could control her feelings upon some subject or another no longer, and she burst into an agony of weeping, crying out as she did so—

"He is lost! Oh, he is lost! My son—my son! he is lost!"

"Hush! Oh, hush!" said the landlord.

The landlord might as well said "Hush!" to some torrent, for the landlady's grief having once got the upper-hand of her, it could not possibly be restrained, and in a moment or two the sister joined in the sobbing, and Claude Duval and his friends looked upon the scene with the greatest possible surprise.

This surprise, upon the part of Duval and his friends, though, was very much heightened, and the mysterious conduct of the landlord and his family reached its climax, when he suddenly plumped down upon his knees before Claude, and holding up his hands, said, while the tears streamed down his face—

"Oh, sir, I don't know if you have any children of your own, or if you are likely to have any, but you may, you know; and so I conjure you to have some mercy upon my poor, unhappy boy."

"Yes—yes," cried the landlady, "have mercy upon him."

"Oh, do—do!" cried the sister.

"Good God!" said Claude, "what on earth is the meaning of all this? I don't understand a word that you are talking about. Pray, good folks, are you all a little mad or not?"

"Oh, no—no!"

"Then explain yourselves."

"Oh, sir, we know you."

"Do you, indeed?"

"Yes, sir, too well—too well."

"And, pray, who am I? If you know me, perhaps you can name me, although if you do I cannot for the life of me see what that has to do with him whom you call your unhappy son."

"But, sir—good sir, you are——"

"What, pray?"

"An officer—a Bow-street officer."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, sir, and those are your two comrades. Is it not too true?"

"My good friend, I don't know for the life of me what cause you have to fear or to expect Bow-street or any other officers here in this house; but as far as we are concerned you may banish your fears, for we are not at all in that line, I assure you."

"You are not?"

"Most certainly not."

"Oh, what a relief—oh, what a relief this is, to be sure! Don't say another word about it, I beg of you, gentlemen—oh, don't. It's nothing at all—it's nothing, wife, is it?"

"Yes, husband, it is much."

"No—no—no."

"But I say it is, and I have a strong opinion upon the subject. I think that, after the mistake we have made, and after the way that these gentlemen have been treated by us, that we ought to explain all about it to them."

"Oh, dear—oh, dear!"

"Don't say, 'Oh, dear!' you might say that if our Charles were guilty; but as he is not, it is quite another affair; so don't, I beg of you."

"Well, then, I won't; and if the gentlemen will be so good as to attend to what we have to say it may lighten our griefs a little to tell it. Oh, where is my poor boy—where is he—oh, where is he?"

"Don't make that noise," said Claude. "Tell me, some one or other of you, as quietly as you can, what is amiss; but, first of all, why did the striking of eight of the clock have such an effect upon you?"

"Because," said the mother, "we expected Charles to arrive here by then, and he told me if he did not get home at that hour he would surely be in the hands of the police."

"But what has he done to make him obnoxious to the attentions of the police?"

"Nothing—oh, nothing."

"Well, that is strange. Pray tell me, then, what he has to fear?"

"My poor boy, Charles, sir," said the mother, "is, or I should say was, in the employment of a great merchant in the City, who is very rich; and as my boy is very good-looking, though I say it, who, perhaps, should not, the merchant's daughter, Miss Annie Hargrave, fell in love with him."

"No—no, wife," said the landlord.

"Yes, you know she did."

"Well, but you should say that our Charles fell in love with Miss Annie. That is the proper way to put it. Young ladies, you know, ought not to be supposed capable of falling in love with young gentlemen."

"Well, but, John, I think they are. I suppose I know more about young ladies than you do—what they are likely to do, and what not?—and I can tell you that they are continually falling in love, only that they do not say anything about it."

"Pray go on," said Claude.

"I will, sir. Then I may say, that my son and Miss Hargrave mutually fell in love with each other."

The landlord nodded.

"But, sir, when Mr. Hargrave found it out, which he did by a little accident that occurred to make him suspicious."

"Yes," said the landlord, "it was but a trifle. One day he went into the drawing-room, and instead of my son being at his desk in the counting-house below, he was kneeling at Miss Annie's feet, and she was a-kissing of him, and he was a-kissing of her, that was all."

"Yes, nothing else in the world," said the landlady, "and that made him suspect that they had made acquaintance with each other."

"I should rather think it would," said Claude.

"Do you, sir?"

"Certainly I do, madam. But go on. This Mr. Hargrave must have been a tolerably suspicious sort of man."

"Yes, and, as you hear, about nothing almost. Well, sir, what must he do but put himself into a violent rage, and turn our boy Charles out of the house: but not content with that, he came down here the next day before we knew anything about the matter, and said to us—'Where is the thousand pound note that your son has robbed me of?'"

"Indeed?"

"Yes, sir. Well, when we heard that, we naturally screamed together, and then he said in quite a blustering way—'I shall have your son apprehended, unless you send him out of the country pretty quickly; he has stolen a thousand pound note of mine, and it is not likely I am going to put up with such a loss.' Well, sir, when he had said that, and frightened us all out of our wits, he went, leaving us in a pretty situation."

"When was that?" said Claude.

"Only yesterday morning, sir; but before we could think of what to do, there came a letter from Charles, explaining all about it, and saying that he was in hopes of getting an interview with Miss Annie, and persuading her to run off with him; he said, if we had anything to write to him, to send it under cover to a shop in Oxford Street; so we let him know what had happened here, and in answer he sent a few lines to say that if he were not with us by eight o'clock this morning, to conclude that old Mr. Hargrave had done his worst, for that he, Charles, was desperate, and if Annie would not be his, he did not care one straw what became of him."

"And that is all?" said Claude.

"It is, sir; so we thought you were an officer, we did indeed; and expecting our son every moment, you may easily guess what a state of mind we were in when we saw you."

"It is natural that you should be rather frightened, I admit," said Claude; "and I am very happy to inform you that I am not only no officer, but that I think your son is falsely accused by Mr. Hargrave, and that, much as he has the villany actually to concoct such a terrible plot against him, such a charge, under the circumstances, will never be able to be maintained against the young man."

"Oh, sir, do you, indeed and in truth, think so?"

"Upon my honour I do."

"What a relief that is," said the landlord. "I will run and get some of the old Madeira out of the corner of the cellar, and we will have a glass of it together, for who knows, after all—ha—ha!—but that our son, Charles, may persuade the sweet young lady to run away with him, and so be married to her—eh, wife?"

"Ah, who knows, indeed," said the wife, with a toss of her head. "I'm sure there's lots of lords and dukes that is no more to be compared in looks and manners to my Charles, though I say it, who ought not perhaps, than chalk is to cheese."

"To be sure," said the sister, "he is a genteel youth."

"Hush!" said Claude, starting up.

"Oh, sir, what is it?"

"The sound of wheels."

"Wheels? Oh, there's wheels within wheels in this world," said the wife.

The sound of horses' feet, now, as well as wheels, came plainly upon their ears; and before they could get to the door it was quite clear that some carriage had stopped at it.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXIII.

MISS HARGRAVE IS PROTECTED BY CLAUDE AND HIS GALLANT FRIENDS.

The state of terror in which the landlord and his family evidently were now had about it something truly ludicrous. The landlord, himself, showed a strong desire to hide himself under the table. The wife went into hysterics, and the sister looked as though she fancied the chimney would not be a bad place to get into.

"Silence, all of you," said Duval. "Everything is to be lost by fear, and nothing is ever to be gained by it."

"Yes—yes," gasped the landlord. "I—oh, dear!"

"Stay where you are all of you; I will go to the door and see who is there."

"Oh—oh!"

"Silence, I say—silence!"

The peremptory way in which Claude Duval spoke had the effect even of causing the landlady to smother her hysterics, and the landlord himself sat looking intently at Claude as if he had only just then seen him for the first time.

"I will go to the door," said Duval to Jack and Dick; "you stay here; I will call to you if I want you."

"All's right," said Jack.

"Take care of yourself," said Dick.

"I will, you may depend."

Claude Duval was at the door of the little inn very quickly, and then he saw a chaise with the horse all in a foam in it, and a young man just alighting from it. In the chaise, too, there was a figure muffled up in several shawls and a cloak, and Claude Duval formed his own conclusions regarding that figure.

Stepping up to the side of the chaise, Duval said to the young man—

"Premising before I ask you any questions that I am a friend, let me request of you to know if your name is Charles?"

"It is. Stand off, sir."

"And you are the son of the landlord here?"

"I am. What of that?"

"Nothing particular, except that your friends here will be glad to see you. This, I suppose, is the fair and accomplished Miss Hargrave?"

When Claude Duval uttered these words, the figure that was enveloped in the shawls and the cloak uttered a scream, and turning to Claude, he saw the face of the loveliest young girl that he thought he had ever seen in all his life. She was very young evidently, but there was such a sweetness of expression, and such a purity of look and general appearance about her, that it was quite a charming thing to have the opportunity of gazing upon such a face.

"Spare him!" cried the young lady. "Oh, spare him! He is indeed innocent, and the time will come when my cruel father will repent of the false charge he has made against my Charles."

"Oh, my Annie," said Clarles, "it cuts me to the heart to hear you plead for me. Sir, I know not who or what you are, but I defy you."

The idea of such a mere stripling as Charles defying a man like Claude Duval, whom few strong, stout men could very well defy, was rather absurd, and Claude said with a smile—

"My good sir, you and I, together with a couple of friends I have in the inn, may, I hope, defy your foes; but I am afraid that if we defy each other we shall do no good at all. Come in at once, and be assured that I am your friend."

Charles looked a little doubtful; young as he was, he had seen more of the world than Annie Hargrave, and he had found out how

"A man may smile—and smile, and be a villain."

But Annie called to him tenderly, saying—

"Oh, Charles, this is a friend to us, indeed. If he be not, there is no faith in outward virtue, for never, surely, could hypocrisy look and speak as he does."

Claude turned to the young girl, as he said—

"From my heart, Miss Hargrave, I thank you for that kind opinion. He hall not be betrayed by me, you may depend upon it. And now, Mr. Charles, ill you trust me?"

"I will, sir. But how came you to know who I am, and who the young lady passes my comprehension most completely."

"I have heard your whole story from your mother."

"Ah, then I am satisfied. Come now, my darling Annie; let me help you to alight from this vehicle, which has served us so well, and my father will look after the horse, which has done its duty so gallantly."

"Oh, Charles, are we not pursued?"

"We were so, dear one, but we have evidently baffled pursuit, or they would be closer to us than they seem to be."

Charles helped the young lady from the chaise to the ground, and as he did so, Claude, who was rather a close observer, saw that they both took advantage of the occasion to give each other a very tender and loving embrace, which seemed so to intoxicate the young clerk with joy, that his eyes sparkled again with the delight of his heart.

From what he now saw of both of them, Duval was more than ever inclined to befriend them to the best of his ability, and he called out to the landlord in a loud voice to come out.

In another moment the landlord embraced his son, and then he began to make a number of bows to Miss Hargrave, but she stepped up to him, saying in her sweet voice—

"You are my dear Charles's father, so I will show to you the duty and the love of a daughter."

With these words, she placed her arms upon his neck, and the landlord looked as though he were ready to sink through the ground.

"Oh, lor!" he cried. "She is an angel—quite an angel! Oh, Charles, how did you get such a sweet, dear, delightful——Oh, what is that? Horses' feet!"

"Hold!" said Claude, as he put himself into an attitude of listening.

They were all for a few moments like statues, so still were they; and then Claude said—

"Mr. Charles, have you any reason to anticipate peril?"

"I have."

"Do you think your enemies know the route you took?"

"I am afraid they suspect it"

"Then they are coming."

"Oh, my poor boy!" cried the landlord—"oh, my Charles, what on earth will become of him? He is lost!"

"Silence," said Claude. "I think, Master Charles, you were imprudent to come here. You would naturally be sought at this place."

"Yes, sir, it may be so, but my tenderness for the fair fame of Annie is such that I could not feel happy to place her in any other hands than in those of my mother, and that is why I came here at once; but I have yet hope that the persons who are approaching may be merely casual travellers on the road."

"Oh, no—no," said the landlord.

Miss Hargrave clung to Charles in quite an agony of terror, and Claude, then, after a moment's thought, said—

"Come in-doors, all of you. Stop! you, Mr. Landlord, put up the horse and the chaise at once in the stable. Surely, there are some places in this old house in which the lovers can hide?"

"Oh, no—no!" cried Annie, "that will look like guilt. My Charles must not hide from any man, not even from my father."

There was something so noble about the young girl's air and manner as she said these words, that Claude Duval admired her more than ever, but again he urged them to come into the house while the landlord put aside the chaise and the horse, and they accompanied him into the room where the mother and sister, and Claude's two friends were.

The meeting between the mother and her son was deeply affecting; but Claude Duval felt all the emergency of the situation of the young couple, and he said—

"Now hide yourselves, both of you, for however it may look like guilt, and be an action of guilt to do so, yet innocence itself is compelled at times in this world to hide its head."

"Mother," said Charles, "to you, and to you, aunt, I commit the care of this dear girl. Let it be sufficient for you to know that I love her better than I do my life; and rather than that a hair of this dear head should be injured, I would lay down that life with pleasure. Take care of her, for if anything should happen to her, I cannot live in this world."

"Charles—Charles!" cried the girl.

"Dear Annie, go and let me remain here to meet every questioning. I am innocent of all but loving you too well."

"They will kill you, Charles!"

"No," said Claude Duval, "you may trust me and my friends here with his safety. I think that, feeling his own innocence as he does, it is as well that Charles should face his enemies. If they have any authority at all, it is over him, and not over you, Miss Hargrave; and if they find him here, they have no right to enter a single room of this house in the name of the law; and if they attempt to do it in the name of violence and force in search of you, we will resist them; so Charles is doing the best thing he can to save you."

"Yes, at the sacrifice of himself."

"No—no! It may not be so."

"Charles?"

"Yes, dear Annie?"

"Do you command me to go?"

"No—no! So harsh a word as command to you can never pass these lips; but I ask you to go, dear one."

"Oh, Charles, that is, indeed, a command. Farewell! Oh, sir,"—turning to Claude—"you will protect him?"

"With my life."

The look of gratitude that the young girl gave to Duval went to his very heart; and if before, which, in truth, he was not, he had been ever so lukewarm in the cause of Charles, he would from that moment have felt that it was a sacred duty with him to do all that was possible in conformity with his promise to that young and beautiful creature.

The lovers took a kind farewell of each other; and just as a party of horsemen of some six or ten in number dashed up to the door of the inn, Charles's mother and aunt conducted Annie Hargrave to the upper part of the house.

Charles looked a little pale, and the father, who had come in from attending to the horse and chaise, was in a terrible state of agitation. Placing his hands upon the shoulder of his son, he said, in a voice that was choked by sobs—

"My boy—my Charles! Oh, tell me—tell me, are you in truth innocent?"

"I am, father."

"Entirely so, and not by any—any——"

"Any what, father?"

"Any odd way of putting it, you know, so as to say that it was no real crime, or anything of that sort?"

"Father, I am innocent in every possible meaning of the word. I am falsely accused of stealing a thousand pound note. I know nothing on oath about it, sir, beyond taking it from a banker's and placing it in Mr. Hargrave's own hand."

"Then you had it once in your possession?" said Claude.

"I had, sir."

"I see, then, how the charge is made. He denies having received it from you?"

"He does, I suppose."

Claude felt very uneasy now for Charles, for he saw how easily, if Mr. Hargrave chose to destroy the note, he could fix the charge upon him by taking oath that he had never received it of him, while the banker could prove that he paid it to him, Charles, upon his, Mr. Hargrave's, account.

All these considerations did not at the moment present themselves to the young man; for, to tell the truth, his mind was so full of his dear Annie, that he thought but little of the peril in which he himself stood at that moment.

"Hilloa!" cried a horse voice from the door of the inn. "Hilloa! Is nobody at home here? Hoi! House here!"

"They come," said the landlord.

"Don't be alarmed," said Claude. "Let me speak and act in the matter. There is yet a chance."

As he spoke, Claude looked at Dick and Jack in such a manner, that they quite concluded he did not intend to let young Charles be taken, and they gave him a nod each in reply, to intimate that they were quite ready to act with him in the matter.

Before anything else could be said in the matter, the sound of footsteps in the passage came upon the ears of all in the room, and the door being violently opened, the party of mounted men who had stopped at the inn, and who had left one only of their number outside to take care of the horses, marched in.

"Stop, if you please!" said Claude Duval, advancing two steps in front of his friends. "Pray what do you want?"

This calm and cool address had the effect of stopping the sudden entrance of the officers, and the chief of them said in a civil enough tone of voice—

"I don't know what right you have to ask, but as I am always ready to answer a civil question to a gentleman, as you seem to be, I may say that I am an officer of the police, and that I have a warrant for the apprehension of Charles Brownlow, on a charge of felony against his master, Mr. Hargrave; and having reason to suppose he is here, I come here to seek him."

"He is here! He must be here!" said a voice in angry tones, and a man, with a countenance distorted by passion, pushed forward through the group of officers. "I will have the villain's life, for he has robbed me of my money and of my daughter, too! I say, I will see him hanged for it! I told him I would and I will!"

CHAPTER CCCLXXXIV.

MR. HARGRAVE FINDS THAT HIS VILLANY IS FULLY DISCOVERED.

After this speech from the violent man, there could be no doubt of his identity as Mr. Hargrave; so Claude Duval addressed him, saying—

"Sir, you shall have justice."

"Justice!" he cried. "I will have justice without your interference, sir. I don't care a straw who you are, sir. I will hang him if it costs me ten thousand pounds to do so; and if once I get hold of that undutiful child of mine, I will make her bitterly repent of her bad conduct, that I will. The hussy—the little wretch! Oh, I will make her smart for this morning's work, I will, indeed, and I will hang Charles Brownlow!"

The officer who had the command of the party shook his head, as he said—

"Sir, you will permit me to say, that it is very imprudent, indeed, of you to go on in this way."

"And why so, sir?"

"Because it looks as if revenge, and not justice, were your aim; and when the young man is put upon his trial, and I report your words that you would spend ten thousand pounds to get him hanged, it will go a long way towards getting him acquitted."

The demoniac look that came over the face of Mr. Hargrave as the officer said this, was truly dreadful to see.

"Ha—ha!" he cried; "it don't matter. The case is so strong against him, so clear, and so simple in its strength, that if the whole world were to say all sorts of things, it could not have the effect of contradicting the testimony against him."

"I admit it is a strong case, sir."

"Yes, you do well to admit it, for, in good truth, it is a strong case. Ha! ha! It is a case which will be his death—his death!"

The chief officer made no reply to these words; but turning about, he said—

"Is the master of the house here?"

"Yes," stammered the landlord. "I am that unhappy individual."

"Then, here is our warrant to search these premises, or any other that we may have reasonable suspicions of, for Charles Brownlow, accused of felony. You will be very ill-advised, indeed, Mr. Brownlow, if you place any obstruction in our way."

"I will not."

The landlord spoke very faintly, and was forced to drop into a chair, where he sat, looking so ill, that the officers really pitied him as the father of the youth whose fate, in their minds, was sealed.

It was then, at the moment that Mr. Hargrave was rubbing his hands together, and glaring about him like a fiend, and that the officers were preparing to search the house, that, from behind Jack and Dick, young Charles Brownlow stepped forward, saying as he did so—

"There need be no further trouble, gentlemen—I am here!"

"Ah!" cried Mr. Hargrave, "seize him! Bind him! Put fetters on him! This is the villain—this is the villain!"

"There is no occasion, sir," said the chief officer, "for either violence or torture. Are you Charles Brownlow, late a clerk in the service of Mr. Hargrave?"

"I am."

"Then, you are my prisoner."

Charles bowed.

"Upon what charge," said Claude Duval, "is this young man taken?"

"For stealing a thousand pound note."

"I deny it," said Charles. "I call upon you all to witness that I deny the charge in toto. I did receive a thousand pound note from the Bank of England on account for Mr. Hargrave, in whose employment I was, and I gave it into his own hands in his own private counting-house within ten minutes after so receiving it."

"False—false as hell!" cried Mr. Hargrave, stamping fiercely upon the floor of the room.

"My good sir," said the officer, "there is no occasion for all this violence; we are not trying the case here, I assure you."

"But it is false!"

"It is true," said Charles.

"Well—well, you have both had your say," said the officer, "and there is an end of that. You will come to town with us, Charles Brownlow; our duty is quite plain and easy. It is, to lodge you in jail; and whether you be innocent or guilty is a matter with which, you see, we have nothing to do."

"Certainly," said Charles, "and I thank you for the kind way in which you are disposed to do your duty. I am really."

"Stop!" said Claude—"stop a minute. The charge is quite absurd, for Mr. Hargrave, if he were put upon his oath, don't know the number of the note, and Mr. Charles Brownlow does."

"Not know it?" cried Mr. Hargrave—"not know it? I do know it. I—I ought to know it. It is——"

"Well, sir?"

"It is 9—9—no, not 9—yes, it is 90. Stop a bit, I will soon confound you all, for I made a memorandum of the number of the note in my pocket-book this very morning."

"From the note itself?" said Claude.

"No, sir, not from the note itself, for I never saw it. I am not to be so very easily trapped, sir, as all that comes to. No, sir, the memorandum I made was from the information the bank clerk gave me, sir, if you please. Ha—ha!"

Mr. Hargrave nodded and smiled in the most vicious manner in the world, as if he had attained some great triumph over Claude Duval; and then going to the window of the room he looked in his pocket-book, and called out—

"The number of the note is 9023."

"Very good," said Claude. "Write that down, Mr. Officer, if you please."

The officer smiled as he said—

"I shall remember it; but really, Mr. Hargrave, you are acting very foolishly in this matter."

"Never mind—never mind. I stick to it. And now, if you please, we will search for the other delinquent."

"The other what, sir?"

"The other delinquent."

"And who may he be, sir?"

"My runaway daughter—the companion of the flight of this young vagabond. My daughter, whom he has seduced."

"Sir," said Charles, "that is false; and but for the halo that surrounds even you of respect, as being the father of Annie, I would knock you down for those words."

"Knock me down?"

"Yes, sir, for a foul calumniator of female innocence."

"Wretch! I say again you have seduced her!"

"Stop—stop!" cried the officer. "It is a very odd thing to hear a father accusing his child and somebody else defending her. But that is no business of mine. Come along, Charles Brownlow, to town at once."

"Yes, I am ready," said Charles.

"And so am I," said Mr. Hargrave, "as soon as you have searched this house from top to bottom for my lost daughter. I will have every hole and cranny of it looked into. Oh, I will make her remember this day's work!"

"Well, sir," said the officer, "search away."

"But you and your men will search?"

"Oh, no."

"No? Did you say no?"

"Yes, sir, we did. We have no warrant to search the house but for Charles Brownlow, and he is here."

"Yes," said Claude; "and the landlord of this house forbids any man at his peril to attempt to enter a room in it without his permission."

"Death and fury!" cried Mr. Hargrave.

"Yes, sir," said the officer, "death and fury are very hard words; but we are not going to have an action against us for trespass because you say death and fury."

"I will search the house myself, then," said Mr. Hargrave. "I and Mr. Jacob Bell. Jacob Bell—Jacob Bell! where are you? Never mind the horses, let them go to the d—l. Come here, Jacob Bell."

A man with a cringing gait entered the room, and bowing very low before Mr Hargrave, he said—

"Honoured sir, what is your noble pleasure?"

"Jacob Bell, you will help me to search this house for my lost daughter. Charles Brownlow is arrested, as you see."

"Oh, the villain!"

"Yes, Jacob, he is a villain."

"Oh, the wretch, to rob such a master—such a good master, too! Oh, Charles—Charles, how could you be so wicked? You will be hanged now, you unhappy young man, and I shall be compelled to give my testimony, humble as it is, against you."

"Against me! What do you mean?"

"Tell him," said Mr. Hargrave—"tell him."

"Why, Charles, I am sorry to say I saw you put the note into your own pocket, and I heard you say, 'Old Hargrave shall never see this note again. I will keep it as an instalment of his daughter's fortune.'"

"You vile fabricator!" said Charles, springing forward and catching Jacob Bell by the throat, "such words never passed my lips, or ever occurred to me. How dare you look me in the face, with such a hideous lie in your mouth?"

"Murder! murder!"

The officers rescued Jacob Bell from Charles, and Mr. Hargrave cried out—

"There, you see, you would not handcuff him, and that is the consequence of it. You see he assaults the witness, you see—you see."

"Oh yes, sir, we see."

"He! he!" said Jacob Bell, as he righted his cravat, "I fully expected to suffer; but as it is in the cause of my much honoured and beloved master I don't care. Oh dear, no—I don't care. He will make it up to me."

"I will, Jacob, you may depend."

"Oh, sir—oh—oh!"

Jacob bowed almost to the floor, and then Mr. Hargrave cried out—

"You and I, Jacob will search this house for my daughter. I am not afraid of your actions of trespass. Ha! ha! Out of the way, man!"

"No, thank you, sir," said the landlord.

Claude Duval had whispered in the landlord's ear what he ought to do; and seeing that the officers would not support Mr. Hargrave, and that Claude and his friends would support him, he gathered courage to act.

"Out of the way, fellow!"

"No, this is my house, Mr. Hargrave, and if you don't like it you may leave it; and if you are disorderly I will turn you out. As to searching my house, it is a thing I can't permit, and I won't either."

"Force your way, Jacob Bell."

"Try it," said the landlord.

"Yes, sir," said Jacob. "I—that is—oh, dear me, what a ruffian he looks, sir! If you were to go first, I don't think he would dare to hit such a great gentleman as you are, sir. Tell him you are worth two thousand pounds a year, sir, and if he hinders you after that, he must be mad."

"If he had twenty millions," said the landlord, "I'd knock him down."

The officers looked on rather amused at this scene, and Mr. Hargrave turning to them, said savagely—

"Of course, you will interfere if there is a breach of the peace?"

"Yes, if called upon by the master of the house."

"The master of the house?"

"Certainly. You are the interloper here, you know, sir. If you go outside into the road, there can't be any breach of peace, unless the landlord comes after you, and then he will be in the wrong; but you can't expect us to help you when you come into a man's house and assault him."

"I don't care—I don't care. I can see that there is a staircase in that corner yonder, and it may lead me to where I shall find my most undutiful child. Come on, Jacob Bell, I command you! Clear that man out of the way, or I will discharge you from my service."

Jacob Bell, under the dread of the threat, stepped forward, but Claude put out his foot, and Jacob trod upon it.

"What!" said Claude, "are my toes to be trodden upon in this desperate way by a ruffian! Villain! you seek my life, and in self-defence—mind you all, gentlemen, only in self-defence—I am compelled to put Jacob Bell gently outside the house."

As he spoke, Claude pounced upon poor Jacob Bell, and catching him by the back of the neck with the left hand, and the lower part of his apparel with the right, he sent him like a bomb-shell, head-foremost, right through the window into the yard, where he alighted amid a whole litter of pigs, who were busily amusing themselves on a dung-heap.

When Mr. Hargrave saw in what a violent and ready way his man-of all-work, Jacob Bell, was disposed of by one of the friends of the Brownlow family, he staggered back aghast, and did not stop till he reached the door, crying out as he did so—

"Help—help! Murder—murder!"

It so happened that these cries had some effect; although it was rather an absurd thing to hear them coming from the person who was quite untouched, while he who was is some degree of peril—that is to say, Jacob Bell—after uttering one great howl, said not a word.

The voice of Mr. Hargrave calling for help, and uttering that one fearful word "Murder," came upon the ears of his daughter, Annie, as she sat trembling in the bed-chamber of the landlady; and her kind and gentle feelings towards her father, notwithstanding he had ever treated her with a kind of harshness that might well have dissipated any tenderness she might naturally have for him, induced her to fly to his aid.

Rising from the old-fashioned arm-chair upon which she sat, she cried out—

"That is my father's voice. They are killing him!"

"Oh, no," said the landlady, "don't you think that, my dear. Nothing is more unlikely than such a thing. Don't you take that into your head."

"Yes—yes, he called murder, and it is my duty to go to him. He may forget the duty of a father, but I cannot take such an example even from him, and forget the duty of a child."

With this, despite an attempt the landlady made to stop her, Annie ran down stairs.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXV.

THE ARRIVAL OF SIR JOHN HARE, AND THE DISCOMFITURE OF MR. HARGRAVE AND JACOB.

It did not occur to Mr. Hargrave that he could possibly have such a hold upon the heart and the affections of the fair young girl, whose beauty he had only looked upon with an idea that it might, by wedding her to some man of rank, favour his own ambition, as to induce her when he cried for aid to forget every other consideration, and fly to his side.

When, therefore, from the staircase that Jacob Bell had made such an abortive effort to get up there came the vision of such loveliness, and with her long fair hair hanging in disorder, and alarm upon her sweet face, Annie appeared, Mr. Hargrave was scarcely less surprised than any one else in the apartment.

"Father—father!" she cried, "where are you?"

"My daughter!" said Mr. Hargrave.

"Yes, father, you called for aid—I am here."

"Good. Ha—ha!"

Annie looked about her in surprise, and Claude Duval stepped between her and her father, saying—

"Miss Hargrave, I am sorry to say that you have let your feelings get the better of your prudence in this matter. Mr. Hargrave is in no danger."

"But I heard a cry."

"True, you did."

"Of murder!"

"Yes; but it was fear, not danger, that provoked it."

"I don't care what provoked it," cried Mr. Hargrave, "so long as it has had the effect of producing this disobedient girl, whom I shall take with me to London, and I dare any one to interfere between me and her."

"I interfere!" said Claude Duval.

"And who the devil are you, after all? You seem to be very busy here, and you take upon yourself much—too much. You appear to have a liking to interfere in my affairs, sir."

"I have. You are right there, sir."

"Stand aside, villain!"

"Say that again, Mr. Hargrave, and you will find yourself with your friend Jacob Bell."

"Jacob Bell?" said Annie. "Is he here?"

"He is, to the confusion of you and your lover," said the father. "Upon the evidence of that very excellent man, Jacob Bell, I shall be able to commit Charles Brownlow of robbery; and in these glorious days, with such a king upon the throne as George the Third, who wishes every child in his dominions to read the bible, there is no escape for any one convicted of even a robbery; so hanged he will be."

"No—no!"

"Ah! we shall see—we shall see."

"Charles—my Charles, where are you?"

"Here, Annie," said Charles Brownlow, in a voice of affection.

"Oh, Charles, do not be cast down. Heaven will save you."

"Oh, Annie, it is not upon my account that I am cast down; but why did you leave the place of safety you were in? Here you would have had a safe asylum for a little time until my father and mother could have conveyed you somewhere else; but now, alas! you have appeared, and it will go hard with you to resist your father."

"You are a capital lawyer, sir," said Mr. Hargrave, rubbing his hands together; "my daughter is under age; therefore, I have absolute control over her. Ha! ha! Good gracious! what is that?"

Poor Jacob Bell had been all that time struggling and kicking to get out from the entanglements of the dung-heap, and now with a loud groan, and the most deplorable look in the world, he projected his head through one of the broken panes of the window through which he had been flung, and glared at the party present.

When Mr. Hargrave shouted and uttered an exclamation, all eyes followed him, and then they saw the miserable object that Jacob Bell looked.

"Oh—oh—oh!" said Jacob. "The Lord have mercy upon us all, miserable sinners! where am I now? and what is going to happen next?"

"It is Jacob," said Mr. Hargrave.

"Yes, sir, the ghost of your Jacob."

"Come in, idiot!"

"I'm coming, sir, if you please."

"Stop!" cried Claude.

"Oh, dear, yes, sir. Anything that you wish, I'm sure, I am delighted to attend to."

"I think, Jacob, you are safer where you are."

"If you think so, sir, I'm quite convinced that I am, and no sort of mistake. Oh, dear! oh, dear! was it a bomb-shell?"

"A what?"

"A bomb-shell."

"What do you mean, you fool?" cried Mr. Hargrave. "Are you mad?"

"Well, it's enough to make a fellow a little queer in his upper story; but it seems to me that nothing short of a bomb-shell could have sent a Christian right through a window in the sort of way that I went; and the pigs, sir, that were outside all fell upon me, and have torn my clothes dreadfully, sir. Oh, what am I to do?"

"What you please," said Claude.

"No more of this," said Mr. Hargrave. "Officers, do your duty. I no longer want your aid to secure my daughter—that I will do myself. All you have to do is to take your prisoner, Charles Brownlow, to London."

"We are ready."

"And as for you, Annie, I will settle matters with you when we get to London; so come at once without any further parley about it."

"Oh, save me!" said Annie.

"That is enough," said Claude Duval; "do you wish to go with your father or not?"

"I do not. I fear him."

"Yes," said the father, "and you shall have good reason to fear me before I have done with you, ungrateful girl that you are. Come with me at once, I command you to follow me."

"That is quite sufficient, sir," said Claude Duval. "If Miss Hargrave chooses to follow you of her own accord, and without any fear, she, of course, might go; but you shall not take her from here except with her own consent."

"I claim her as a right. She is under age."

"Assert your right then."

'I do so."

"Enforce it, then."

"Villain! the law will aid me."

"Go to law, then. Until you do so, and get such aid as the law will give you, this young lady will not be given up, and perhaps not then."

Mr. Hargrave had seen enough to know that he was baffled; and Charles Brownlow, as he seized Claude Duval by the hand, and shook it heartily, cried out—

"Oh, sir, you have raised me from despair again; and you, Annie, be but firm, and you are yet free from the tyranny of a home which is undeserving of so much excellence and beauty. Now, Mr. Hargrave, I am ready to go to London, and to meet the charge that you have to make against me."

"Stop," said Claude Duval, "I have sent one of my friends on a little message, and I advise you all not to go till he returns."

The officers shook their heads, and the chief said—

"We cannot wait. Come along, Mr. Brownlow."

"Nay," said Claude Duval, who about ten minutes before had whispered something in the ear of Jack, which had induced him abruptly to leave the room—"nay, let me beg of you to give five minutes more to this affair.'

"We cannot."

"We will not," said Mr. Hargrave.

Charles looked from one to the other in surprise as to what could be the cause of the delay that his friend Duval wished for, but at that moment Jack entered the room rather in haste, and said—

"He is coming."

"He?" cried Mr. Hargrave. "And who may he be?"

"Sir John Hare, baronet, and a justice of peace for the county, and special magistrate for this district of the suburbs of London."

"Sir John Hare?"

"Yes—you have heard of him?"

"Pho! I don't care for Sir John Hare. Officers, come along at once. Remember, I will give you a guinea each upon your lodging your prisoner in Newgate."

"But," said the chief officer, "did you say that Sir John Hare was coming?"

"He is," said Jack.

"Well, then, Mr. Hargrave, if that be the case, it would look like disrespect to such a gentleman not to wait for him. It can't make very much difference, you know, for here is the warrant for the apprehension of Charles Brownlow; so you know, sir, we are sure to take him; but as Sir John is a magistrate, why we ought to let him know, if he wishes, what is going on."

"Curse Sir John, and you too."

The officer smiled.

"I think," said Duval, "you are quite right, officer. It is but a little compliment you owe to such a gentleman as Sir John, when he comes in your way."

"But you sent for him?" said Mr. Hargrave, passionately.

"That, sir," said Duval, "is my business."

Mr. Hargrave was upon the point of making some very passionate reply, when the door of the room opened, and a couple of gentlemen appeared upon the threshold.

"Here is Sir John," said the officers, who knew the magistrate in a minute, and touched their hats respectfully to him.

"What is all this about?" said Sir John Hare, as he entered the room. The gentleman who was with him slightly bowed to the company.

"Oh, I will tell you, sir," said Mr. Hargrave.

"Well, sir?"

"I came to identify a thief, sir. This young man here robbed me of a thousand pound note; and as I gave information to Sir Richard Strong at Bow Street, he granted a warrant, and these officers came here to execute it; and I am with them to point out the culprit, as well as to get my daughter home, with whom he had eloped."

"Officer?"

"Yes, Sir John?"

"Is this so?"

"Yes, sir, it is so. Here is the prisoner, and there is the gentleman's daughter."

"You have nothing to do with the young lady?"

"No, Sir John."

"She is not included in the charge, I hope?"

"Oh, no, sir."

"Very well. I don't see what I have to do, except to back the warrant as I am here. Give me pen and ink, and I will put my name to it."

"Ha! ha!" laughed Mr. Hargrave.

"Stop a moment, sir," said Claude Duval, advancing to the magistrate. "Sir John Hare, all England has heard of you as one who is more in love with justice than with law."

"Sir, I am much obliged to you for the compliment."

"This young man, Charles Brownlow, was clerk to this Mr. Hargrave, who charges him with receiving upon his account a note for one thousand pounds from the Bank of England, and never paying over to him the same."

"Yes," said Mr. Hargrave; "and which Jacob Bell has already sworn he saw him in possession of, and heard him say he would keep it."

"Just so. Officer, did you make a memorandum of the number of the note?"

"I did, sir."

"What was it?"

"It was 9023. Mr. Hargrave himself gave that as the number; but, of course, that can easily be ascertained at the Bank of England."

"Yes," said Sir John Hare. "But you will really do me a favour if you will tell me what I have to do with all this? I am not trying the case."

"No, Sir John; but I will show you what you have to do with it. You have written your name on the warrant."

"I have."

"Then you have jurisdiction, if you like; for your name being last on the warrant takes the case into your hands, if you like to deal with it. You can, by law, either send the prisoner to London before a London magistrate, or you can examine him yourself."

"That is quite true; but I shall merely let the officers take him to London."

"I don't think you will, sir. Now, Mr. Hargrave, if you please?"

With two steps across the room, Claude Duval was by the side of Mr. Hargrave; and before he could get out of the way, or make the least resistance, he caught both his arms by the wrists and held them up above his head, saying, as he did so—

"Now, Sir John Hare, this man who charges another with stealing a thousand pound note, No. 9023, has it in his pocket."

These words were uttered by Claude Duval with a shout, that made them ring through the house again, and every one present was amazingly startled at the statement. Jacob Bell at once dropped from the window on to the dung-heap again, for he saw that the game was up with his master.

As for Mr. Hargrave himself, he gasped again with terror, and in the singular attitude that Claude Duval made him assume, with his white face, and his staring eyes, and his mouth wide open, he looked like one transformed by a judgment of Heaven.

"What can you mean, sir, by this extraordinary conduct?" said Sir John Hare. "You surely cannot substantiate what you say?"

"I can, sir."

"Then I—I—blush for human nature."

"Do not do that, Sir John; for the honour of human nature, let you and I, and all of us, believe that there are few men like Mr. Hargrave. Officers, search this man, and if you do not find it as I state, you may take me to Newgate along with my friend Charles Brownlow."

The officers looked at Sir John Hare for a moment, and he gave a slight nod, as much as to say, "Do it." Then they, with the practical celerity they had in such matters, soon found a pocket-book in one of Mr. Hargrave's pockets. The pocket-book was handed to Sir John Hare, who said—

"Mr. Hargrave, if you are innocent of the really fearful charge which is brought against you, you will not shrink from my looking into this pocket-book. If you are guilty, it is my duty to look, for there cannot be a more sacred exercise of the privileges of those who have to administer the law than that which enables them to clear the innocent from an unjust accusation."

Mr. Hargrave tried to speak, but he could only utter a strange guttural sound, and as Claude Duval released him, he sunk into a chair quite prostrated.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXVI.

CLAUDE DUVAL'S LAST APPEARANCE UPON THE ROAD.

THE state of affairs in the house was now so far interesting, that Claude Duval, as he glanced round him, thought he had never seen such a curious picture. There were the young lovers, locked hand-in-hand together, and evidently feeling that to each other they were all the world. There was the father and the mother of the young Charles, and his aunt, all so deeply interested in what was going on, that expression upon their countenances was particularly painful.

Then there was the magistrate, whose mind one might easily see by the look of his eye was quite made up regarding the guilt of Mr. Hargrave; and, lastly, there was the guilty old man himself, who, to be revenged upon his young clerk for daring to love his daughter, had brought such disgrace upon his own head.

Claude Duval and his friends and the officers, together with the old merchant, might be considered as the accessaries of the scene, but that Claude himself was in the foreground a very prominent figure upon the occasion.

The magistrate yet seemed reluctant to open the pocket-book, and he again addressed Mr. Hargrave, saying—

"I presume then, sir, by your silence, you have no objection to my opening the pocket-book, now?"

Again the guilty man tried to speak, but again the words died away in the labouring throat, that could not shape them into anything articulate.

"I take consent, then," said Sir John; "and thus in presence of you all, I put to the test the fearful accusation that has been made against the man."

As he spoke he opened the pocket-book; and almost the first object that met his eyes within it was the very one thousand pound note in question.

"It is here!" said the magistrate. "It is here, to the confusion of the guilty, and to the delight and joy of all who love innocence and justice!"

"No! no!" yelled Mr. Hargrave. "Death and confusion! it is all a trick!"

"Beware!" said the magistrate—"beware what you say! I do not say that it is possible, in a criminal sense, to make your case worse than what it is; but you may yet aggravate the feelings of your fellow-men against you by the manner in which you comport yourself."

"Comport myself? I tell you all that it is false! I came to make a charge. I will have him hung yet!"

"On the contrary," said Sir John, "I feel it to be my duty to arrest you and your rascally accomplice on a charge of conspiracy against the life and liberty of this young man, whom you would have sent to death, knowing that he was innocent of the crime you charged him with."

"Arrest me?"

"Yes, Mr. Hargrave; and I imagine that you have fallen into the hands of a magistrate who will do his duty. Officers, seize that man!"

"Now, sir," said one of the officers, as he laid his hand upon the shoulder of Mr. Hargrave—"now, sir, if you please."

For a minute or two Mr. Hargrave seemed stunned, and so did his daughter; but then she cried out in frantic tones—

"Oh, no—no! He is yet my father! Save him! save him!"

"Impossible," said the magistrate.

The sound of his daughter's voice appeared to have the effect of rousing Mr. Hargrave to a sense of his position; and with a yell that sounded more like what might be uttered by some wild animal disappointed of its prey, when he imagined it to be all but in his grasp, he shook himself from the officers, and rushed out of the inn into the open air.

So very sudden and unexpected was this escape upon the part of Mr. Hargrave, that it took the officers completely by surprise for a few seconds; and then, when they did recover sufficiently to pursue him, they jostled each other at the door of the room in their eagerness so to do.

"After him!" said the magistrate—"after him, officers! It will be a disgrace to you all if he escape!"

The officers made a rush into the passage of the inn; and there they met the ostler, who cried out—

"That's the way he went!—that's the way!"

"Which way?"

"Round the corner, and into the kitchen-garden. Come on—come on!"

"Lead us the quickest way."

"Won't I, that's all. We will soon have him, I take it."

The officers followed the ostler into the kitchen garden of the inn, where he had accidentally seen Mr. Hargrave run, and as he had been listening in the passage, and had heard all that had taken place in the room, he was well aware of the terrible guilt of the man whom he pursued, and was quite willing to aid the officers in every possible way to capture him.

Upon reaching the garden the officers looked about them in surprise, for it was not very large, and it was surrounded by a good brick wall on two sides and by a high paling with nails at the top of it on the third, while the fourth made up the back of the house, and yet no Mr. Hargrave was to be seen.

"By Jove," said one of them, "we are done."

"No—no, he's here," said the ostler; "I tell you, I saw him go. He's hiding among some of the bushes, or in the summer-house, or up a tree."

"Then, hang him, let us ferret him out."

With all the tact that their profession gave them in such matters, the officers searched the garden, but not the remotest trace of Mr. Hargrave could be found within it.

By this time, Claude Duval and his friends, too, had come out into the garden, fully expecting to see Mr. Hargrave a prisoner, and it was well that they did so come out, for the officers were just beginning to accuse the ostler of misleading them, when Dick Turpin said—

"You may depend the ostler is right; for there is a possibility from the window of the room in which we all were of seeing into the garden through a hedge that skirts the little farm yonder; and through that hedge I distinctly saw the figure of Mr. Hargrave, as he ran along the other side of it."

This put the question quite at rest as to whether he had gone that way or not, and a further search of the garden took place, but without effect, so that the officers were compelled to come back to the magistrate, and to inform him of the mysterious escape of the prisoner.

Jack, as he with Claude and Dick followed the officers, just touched each of them upon the arm, and said, in a whisper—

"Stop a bit."

"What is it, Jack?"

"Ah, you have found Hargrave," said Dick.

"Well, I may say I have."

"Call back the officers, then, and give the old rascal into custody."

"No—no, It is better not. The shock will be too great for the fair young creature, the daughter. He is dead."

"Dead, do you say? How do you know that?"

"There is a well in the garden."

"Ah, indeed, and so there is. He is down there, is he, Jack?"

"Yes; most probably by accident he has fallen into it, and there he lies."

"You saw him?"

"I did. By getting in one direction there is light enough down the well just to enable you to see the water, and there is something dark floating in it, which must be Mr. Hargrave."

"Or the bucket?" said Dick.

Claude smiled.

"Come," he said, "we may as well make sure of it."

Upon this they left the officers to go into the house, and proceeded to the well, which was in rather a secluded part of the garden, and there, sure enough, they all saw what looked like the body of a man in the water. The bucket was down, and the cord was at its utmost length; so Claude took hold of the windlass, and wound it up some distance, when the bucket, lodging underneath the dead body of the wretched Mr. Hargrave, brought it sufficiently up for them all three to identify it.

"'Tis he!" said Dick.

"I told you so," said Jack.

"It is, indeed," said Claude, as he let go the rope, and down the body went with a splash again to the bottom of the well.

They all three now looked at each other rather in doubt as to what they ought to do; but Claude Duval at length said—

"I tell you what I think the best plan, and that is, to leave the body where it is, and quietly tell the magistrate of it, and then get the daughter and her young lover to go to London and get married as soon as possible, for the probability is, that she is the heiress of all her father's wealth."

"Good," said Dick. "Let us try and manage it so."

With this impression and resolution, they came into the house again, and Claude Duval, stepping up to the young girl, said—

"My dear, it is quite clear that your father has escaped."

"Oh, sir, are you sure?"

"Quite sure; and now, if you feel that I have done sufficient for you and your lover to render my advice at all valuable or acceptable, I will give it to you."

"Yes, sir, we will follow your advice as if it were a command."

"It is, then, that you both go to London as quickly as possible and get married, and so put it out of the power of malignant fate to separate you."

The young lady was silent; but her lover cried out—

"I never heard such wise and excellent advice in all my life! If you only consent, dear one——"

"Oh, I cannot refuse you now. It would be absurd coquetry upon my part to do so. Take my hand, as you have already taken my heart."

"Never was consent so gracefully given," said Claude Duval. "I daresay the landlord here will go with you and see to every necessary arrangement."

"Oh, dear me, yes," he cried, "and so shall my wife, and her sister can mind the inn while we are gone; and as we have no custom, it is not at all likely that she will have a great deal of trouble. But I insist upon everybody having a drop of something before we go."

The officers did not seem to think that that proposition was by any manner of means a bad one; but the magistrate shook his head, and said—

"I will take a glass of water, if you please, in the which I can just as well drink to the health and happiness of the young couple as in any stronger liquid."

"Well, sir, if you won't have anything but water, I can promise you as fine a glass of that as the whole country can produce. I will go to the well in the kitchen garden myself and get you some."

"Thank you."

"No—no—no!" cried Claude Duval; "stop!"

"Eh? Did you say stop?"

"Yes, I—that is—Did you say the well in the kitchen garden?"

"To be sure I did."

"Well, then, I was going to say that I and my friends, in trying to get up a drop of water, broke the windlass."

"Oh, well, if that is the case, I can get some from a stone filter in the bar, if that will do."

"Quite as well," said the magistrate.

The water from the stone filter was got, and the health and happiness of the young couple was duly drunk; and then in the course of a quarter of an hour they and the landlord and his wife started for London.

The moment they were gone, Claude Duval took the magistrate aside.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXVII.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND HIS FRIENDS SET UP IN A NEW LINE OF BUSINESS COMPLETELY.

The expression of Claude Duval's face as he took the magistrate aside was quite sufficient to convince him that he had something of importance to communicate to him, and he listened with attention as Claude said—

"Sir, I prevented you from getting a draught of water from the well."

"You did; and that you had some motive in so doing, beyond what you state, I could very well guess."

"I had, sir. Mr. Hargrave is there."

"In the well?"

"Just so, sir; and, therefore, I thought that you would prefer a glass of water from any other place just now than that."

"God bless me, yes. But how came you not to mention it before?"

"I feared the effect which such a communication might have upon the sensitive feelings of his daughter; the tidings had better come to her more quietly than they could possibly have reached her here in the midst of all the excitements of the strange scenes that have been enacted in this place."

"You are right, sir. You are considerate as well as right."

"Now, however," added Duval, "I tell you, sir, because it is my duty to do so, you holding the official position that you do, and perhaps, after all, it is the best end that such a man could have possibly come to, considering all things."

"It is, indeed. Think you it was suicide?"

"Certainly not: it was a mere accident, no doubt. He was flying from the officers, and, probably, attending more to them as they came in pursuit of him than to where he was going, and so fell into the well; and as he would go headforemost, probably death would be all but instantaneous."

"It will be my duty," said the magistrate, "then, to inform the coroner for the county of the affair; and then, gentlemen, I shall request the attendance of all three of you at the inquest that will take place."

Claude was silent for a moment or two, for the idea of troubling himself by attending an inquest on the body of old Hargrave was one that he could not entertain for a moment; and yet it was a difficult thing to say no.

"I beg," added the magistrate, "that you will not hesitate about the performance of such a public duty?"

The tone of voice in which this was said convinced Claude that Sir John was likely to have rather a bad opinion of him and his friends if they did not accede to the request; so he said with an air of frankness—

"Well, sir, be it so: we will attend. I presume it will be to-morrow morning, at the earliest, before it takes place?"

"Oh, yes; but if you will do me the favour to breakfast with me in the morning I shall be able to let you know precisely. You, perhaps, know my house. It is not very off—Fairlawn Lodge."

"Thank you, sir; we will do ourselves the honour. And now, as we have really rather an important engagement, we will take our leave of you and the inn for a short time; but as we return here to dinner, if anything should arise for which we may be required, we shall be most happy to attend you."

To all this, sounding so fair and straitforward as it did, the magistrate could make no possible objection; so Claude and his frends went to the inn-yard, and Claude called for the ostler.

"Coming, sir—coming."

"You will saddle our horses, and bring them out as quietly as you can."

"Yes, sir—directly, sir."

"Jack, and you, Dick?" said Claude.

"Yes, Duval? Anything amiss?"

"No, I hope not. But one of the officers has been staring at me for the last quarter of an hour in a way that I don't very well like."

"Indeed?" said Jack.

"Who is he?"

"One there with the red nose. Don't you see him?"

"Yes. Confound him!"

"So say I. But he has put me in the humour of getting away from here just as quick as I can."

"Look! look!" said Jack; "he is going to speak to Sir John."

"Is he?"

"Yes—yes! There, he is making his way up to him."

"I will stop that," said Claude.

If the horses had only been out and ready there is very little doubt but that Claude Duval would have disregarded any communication that the officer might have made to Sir John; but as they were not he felt that the only plan was to gain time, so he strode up to the magistrate at the very moment that the officer did, and just as the latter opened his mouth to speak, Claude said abruptly—

"Sir John, a word with you."

"Certainly, sir."

"I, too, Sir John," said the officer, "wish to say a word."

"Upon my reputation," said Claude, "this is not very respectful conduct. I was speaking to Sir John, and you, fellow, come and interfere."

"Yes, but——"

"Begone, sir," cried Sir John. "How dare you behave in this rude way to a gentleman? Begone, sir!"

"But, Sir John——"

"I will not hear you."

"Oh, sir, I assure you, that——"

"Will you be off, sir? If you say another word I will have your constable's warrant taken from you. Be off, sir."

The officer gave his hat a dab upon the top of it, and strode off in high dudgeon and indignation that he could not be heard.

"Now, sir, if you please," said the magistrate, "I have to apologise to you most sincerely for that fellow's inpertinence."

"Don't mention it, Sir John, I beg," said Claude. "I was only going to say that as I may see the secretary of state this evening, would you think that there was any impropriety in my mentioning to him the occurrence that has taken place in this house to-day?"

"None in the least."

"Then I shall probably do so, for it is a peculiarity of mine when I see a gentleman act in so noble and excellent a manner as you have done to-day, that I cannot, without great violence to my feelings, keep it to myself."

"Sir, you are too good."

"Oh, no—no, not at all."

While Claude and the magistrate were thus complimenting each other, Jack and Dick, who felt that there was no time to lose, urged the ostler to be quick with the horses, and themselves lent a helping hand in getting them ready, so that Claude, who every now and then stole a glance in that direction, saw them both mount, and that Jack held his horse by the bridle all ready equipped for the road.

"Now, Sir John," said Claude, "I leave you with very—very many thanks, sir, for the kindness and civility which we have all received at your hands,"

"Sir, the kindness has all been on your side."

Another moment and Claude was in the saddle. The magistrate patted his horse upon the neck, as he said—

"Upon my word, gentlemen, you are all three well mounted."

"Pretty well," said Claude.

"I don't think that there are three other such horses in the whole country. Why that black mare that you ride, sir,"—speaking to Dick—"is a magnificent creature."

"She is," said Dick. "My Bonny Bess."

"What, sir, do you call her?"

"Elizabeth, sir, that's all."

"Oh, I thought you said Bess—I—God bless me, what is this?"

The officer was tugging at the coat skirts of the magistrate, and then he called out, in a voice partly of rage and partly of fear—

"Sir John, I can't hold my tongue! Sir John, I can't hold my tongue if you kill me for speaking! I tell you, sir, that if that tall one on the bay horse is not Claude Duval, the highwayman, that they call Gentleman Jack, and if this one on the black mare is not Dick Turpin, I'll be hanged."

A flush of colour spread itself all over the face of the magistrate, for if this should be correct information, he saw how terribly he must have been taken in, and what a story it would be to tell against him.

"It's true, Sir John, upon my life it's true."

"No—no. It—cannot—be—To horse! to horse, officers! Hilloa—your pistols."

"Hold, Sir John," said Claude. "Accept our thanks, and if you wish to say anything more to us, you will be able to do it when you catch us at breakfast to-morrow. I have the honour to be Claude Duval."

"And I Dick Turpin," said Dick.

"And I the devil," said Jack. "Whoop, hilloa!"

With a bound they reached the road. For a moment they leant forward in their saddles, and then as the officers hurriedly dragged what horses they could find from the stables, off went Claude and his friends like the wind.

A straggling volley of pistol bullets came after them, without doing the least damage, and in ten minutes they were two miles from the little inn, where they had certainly done much more good than harm, and for which they ought not to have been hunted in such a way.

"Halt!" said Claude.

They all drew up.

"Where are we, Jack?"

"Not very far from Guildford, Claude; but it will be better to get out of the high-road, won't it?"

"Yes. Come on—here's a lane."

A very beautiful lane, down one side of which there flowed a pretty streamlet, lay to the left, as they looked westward, and they at once turned their horses' heads down it, and pursued it about half a mile. Then again ClaudeDuval called a halt, and said to his friends—

"What is to be in our line of business now? I do think that we have seldom, if ever, found ourselves so free from any engagements of any sort as we are now."

"That is true," said Dick Turpin; "but I suppose it is a state of things that is, after all, not likely to last very long."

"Certainly not," said Jack; "but I advise Claude, now that he really does feel himself to be in such a position, to think seriously."

"Of what, Jack?"

"Why, of adopting some means of acquiring money enough to retire from so very perilous a mode of life as this."

Claude shook his head, and then he said, in a voice of emotion—

"Jack, when you utter such a remark as that, you put me in mind of one who is dead and gone long ago, now as it seems to me. When she was alive—I need not more particularly allude to her, for well you know who it is that I mean—when she was alive I ever at her suggestion entertained the hope that the day might come when we might retire to some tranquil spot far away from the turmoils of the great world, and there find the repose that it is in vain to seek within its whirling vortex; but when she left me I had no such hopes, and I only look forward to some sudden death, which will only have one pang, after which I may again look into her eyes."

As he said this, Claude Duval glanced upward, and was silent for a moment or two. Then a remarkable change came over his face, and he cried out—

"Oh, God! 'tis she—'tis she! On the very edge of that silvery cloud I see her now—I see her now!"

CHAPTER CCCLXXXVIII.

THE GUILDFORD COACH COMES TO LONDON IN STRANGE HANDS.

Both Dick and Jack were rather alarmed, as well, indeed, they might be, at this strange conduct upon the part of Claude Duval, for it was the first slight intimation of the fact, or the seeming fact, that the adventurous life he had led had affected his intellect a little.

They looked at one another inquiringly, and then Jack, edging his horse close to Claude, laid his hand upon his arm, saying—

"Claude, you are not well?"

"Yes—yes, Jack, I am quite well."

"No, you ain't," said Dick. "There has been too much excitement at work in your brain, Claude. Come, now, I have certain advice to offer to you, which I hope you will take, for I feel confident it will do you good."

"But I saw her," said Caude. "I tell you I saw her."

"Imagination has played you a trick, Claude."

"No—no! I saw her upon the edge of the cloud, and for a moment—only for a moment, for ere you could say 'Beloved!' 'twas gone. She regarded me with a sweet smile, and beckoned to me."

"Do not, I implore you," said Jack, "give way to such fancies. Believe me, Claude, that if you do, they will take such a hold of you that they will quite unman you, and you will find yourself unfit for any exertion when you are called upon for it."

"No—no, not that, Jack. I am all right as far as that goes, but I am warned, I tell you both."

"Warned of what?" said Dick.

"Of the fact that we shall soon part. And yet I will not willingly, and of my own accord, part with either of you on this side of the grave."

It was impossible that Dick or Jack could pretend to misunderstand that this was a foreboding of death on the part of Claude Duval; and after a brief pause Dick said to him in a serious tone of voice—

"Claude, let me warn you of one thing, and that is, that imagination and fear often fulfil their own prophecies."

"I know it, Dick, but it will not be so in this case; believe me, I will fight to the last; but yet I have a belief that I am near to the end of my career."

"I will hear no more of this," said Jack. "These gloomy fancies will upset us all. I don't wish to hear more about such matters. My own nerves are none of the strongest, as you both well know, and the best thing we can do is to talk of something pleasant, and contrive to live just as long as we possibly can without any forebodings upon the subject."

"I will say no more," said Claude.

"That is right," said Dick; "and now let us trot on again for a little space."

They did trot on, but neither Jack nor Dick could be off from noticing that Claude frequently cast his eyes up to the fleeting clouds that were careering over the sky, evidently having in his mind a hope that he should see again the vision that his heated fancy had once produced.

They neither of them thought it prudent, though, to nurse such thoughts by any further remarks concerning them, so they tried to say things to Claude that would seem to be the furthest possible from any such suggestion, and they had the satisfaction in a little time of finding that to all outward appearance he was much as usual.

The lane that they were in was about a mile and a half in extent, and seemed to lead right away towards the upper part of the Hammersmith Road; but after going about a mile down it they found that the hedge upon one side of it skirted a farm-yard, and from the number of handsome-looking hay-ricks about, they came to the conclusion that they were close to some homestead of importance as regarded size.

"Suppose we stop here," said Dick.

"What, in this lane?" said Claude.

"No; but just take a look over the hedge, Claude, and say what you think of this place. It appears to me that if we must stop somewhere it is better that it should be where we are less likely to meet with unwelcome intruders. One thing is quite clear that we cannot very well keep our horses on their feet now till the evening, if we expect them to be in an efficient condition when that time comes."

"That is true."

"Well, then, let us ask the hospitality of the people of this farm for some few hours, and that will sufficiently swallow up the time, so that we shall be able to take to the road again tolerably fresh."

"Yes," said Jack; "that is better than risking the stopping at any inn."

"Be it so," said Claude Duval.

Having thus obtained Claude's consent to a halt, they rode on till they came to a gate, which led into rather a pretty-looking paddock, at the farther end of which there was another gate, evidently close to the house itself; but, as yet, they could not see any one.

They opened the gate, and rode into the paddock; and then rather a bluff-looking countryman met them, and looked inquiringly at them, upon which Claude said to him—

"My friend, can you allow our horses a rest for an hour or so in the homestead, while we indulge ourselves with a glass of your old ale?"

"Well, I'm danged," said the man, "if you ain't as good as a witch."

"How do you mean?"

"We have got some old ale."

"Oh, yes, I know that quite well," added Claude, who had no very flattering idea of the intellect of the countryman, from his wondering at such an evident guess as that there was some old ale to be had at an English farmhouse.

The terms upon which Claude and his friends could stay at the place as long as they liked were easily settled; and, in wandering about a delicious garden that was attached to the place, they almost forgot that there was such things as prisons and officers in the world.

The shades of evening, however, at last began to fall across the landscape; and the distant trees and hedges and fields began to be mingled together in a mass of confusion.

"It is time to go," said Duval.

"Yes," said Dick. "But stop, now, just for a few moments. I told you while we were in the lane that I had a proposition to make to you; and, as I did not then mention it, I will now."

"Excuse us, Dick, for our non-attention."

"Don't mention that. But listen to me: I should like a change."

"A change, Dick.

"Yes, I want a month's peace and quietness; so I propose that we try this night what we can do on the Guildford road, as regards putting us in funds; and then, if we are fortunate enough to get a good purse full enough for the purpose, I would wish that we should go to some quiet sea-side place for a time, and forget that we are highwaymen, and in peace and security recover the tenour of our minds a little."

Claude looked at Dick for a moment in silence, and then he said—

"This is proposed for my interest, Dick."

"Yes, partly, and partly for my own, and partly for Jack's. I know that we all need such a change. Come, now, Claude, don't object to it."

"I won't. Be it as you propose, if agreeable to Jack. What do you say to it, my old friend?"

"I am perfectly willing," said Jack. "Be it as you both agree; and, in fact, what is now proposed is particularly agreeable to me, and it would be still more so if it could be accomplished at once without the proceeding of to-night's work upon the road."

"Well, let me see," said Dick. "What money have you, Jack."

"None."

"Then that is soon settled. What have you, Claude?"

"Something under ten pounds."

Dick executed a long whistle, and then he said—

"I have about twenty pounds, but that will not be enough to do for us all three, and take care of the cattle, too, for that time, so there is an end of it. To the road we must go, and good luck go with us."

"Amen!" said Jack.

Claude nodded his head, and then he said—

"Now, Dick, you shall be general-in-chief to-night. If you think that the

THE FRIENDS WAITING THE ARRIVAL OF THE GUILDFORD COACH.

Guildford road is the best one we will take to it at once; so come on, I know the way."

This, then, was formally agreed upon between them all, that as soon as they had in any way made up the sum of one hundred pounds they would cease their depredations, and start across the country to some of the little villages upon the Kentish coast, and there take up their abode for a month.

Man proposes and fate disposes, though, and it will be seen whether Claude or his friends were ever destined to carry out such an idea as that which they now entertained.

The night, as it happened, was a very dark one, indeed very much darker than was at all to be expected, considering the age of the moon, but the fact was that a sudden shift of wind about sunset brought from the south-west a great mass of clouds, which effectually obscured all traces of moonlight; and, although they did not at once bring rain, it was pretty evident that they were sufficiently charged with aqueous particles to do so at any small amount of provocation.

This state of things was in many respects more favourable for the designs of Claude Duval and his associates than as if the night had been fine, although in one respect a rather threatening night was bad for them, inasmuch as it kept at home persons who otherwise might have ventured out into the roads, and so become the prey of the highwaymen.

Nevertheless, the three friends took their route by the nearest way they could find to the Guildford road, which was then a much more popular one as regarded coaches, both public and private, than it is now.

By going some distance over a field or two, where they found a bridle path, they at length emerged in a part of the road that was at the foot of a hill, and which was exceedingly favourable for their purpose, inasmuch as if they got just a little way on the assent, as the hill went Londonwise, they would be able to stop any vehicle or horse with ease.

"Here, then, as I am commander-in-chief," said Dick, "I should say, we pause."

"So be it," said Claude.

"But," added Dick, "as I am not at all above taking advice, I would beg to say—Is not this a good place for our purpose?"

"It is, Dick. I don't think, viewing the general description of the ground, we could have a better. All we want now is the enemy."

"And that wish is soon supplied," said Jack, "for, lo! I hear the sound of a horse's feet."

As Dick and Duval had been talking while Jack had been listening, he had caught the sound of advancing feet first; but the moment they turned their attention to the subject they too heard it.

"One horse," said Claude, "and so, we may conclude, one horseman. Who will stop him? It don't want three to one man."

"I will," said Dick.

"Very well; we will take it by turns as long as single passengers only appear. I will sally out to the next one, and you to the third, Jack."

CHAPTER CCCLXXXIX.

THE OFFICERS OF JUSTICE ARE UPON THE TRACK OF THE HIGHWAYMEN.

THERE was not much time for consideration now, for the approaching horseman came on at rather a sharp trot. Upon getting to the commencement of the ascent of the hill, though, he altered the pace of his steed to a walk, and then Dick Turpin went out quite gently into the road and intercepted him.

"Good evening, sir," said Dick.

The horseman paused on the moment, and said in a mild voice—

"Goon evening, sir; but I don't know you."

"You will remember me, though," said Dick. "I don't want to detain you longer than necessary, but you will oblige me with your purse, sir."

"A highwayman!"

"Call me what you will, but be quick."

"Alas, sir, I certainly have a small sum of money about me, but it is the sole hope of one who is in great distress for the want of it. I implore you not to take it from me."

"Stuff," said Dick. "Come, sir, give it up."

"But let me tell you that I am poor. I am a clergyman—a curate merely; my own income is not fifty pounds a year. The little sum of money that I have with me is for the relief of the orphan and the widow. Oh, young man, if you have a heart at all you will let me pass in peace; but if you have not, there is the money, and may God forgive you as I do."

"Pass on," said Dick. "I cannot say whether you are deceiving me and only playing a part or not, but the doubt is sufficient, so pass on. I will not take your money."

Upon this, the clergyman rode close up to Dick, and said—

"It is dark, but yet I would fain see your face, that I may know you again if ever it should be in my power to do you a kindness."

"No—no. It is as well not."

"Oh, yes—yes. Honour me so far, my friend, I beg of you. There, now, a cloud has partially swept from over the face of the moon, and if you turn this way I shall see you."

"Look at me, then," said Dick Turpin, as he took off his hat, and the curate did take a good look at him by the dim night light.

"Shall you know me again?" said Dick.

"I shall."

"Then good-night, sir, and good speed to you."

"Farewell!"

The curate set spurs to his horse, and rode off.

"Am I done," said Dick to himself, "or not? Well, at any rate, if I am taken in, the fellow deserved to get off for his cleverness in playing the part that he did, for in good truth it was admirably done, and, after all, I rather incline to the opinion that it was all true."

When Dick got back to his friends he told them exactly what had taken place, and Claude said at once—

"You did quite right, Dick. The gold that would be necessary for the wants of the widow and the orphan would do us no good."

"Not a whit," said Jack. "It would bring a curse with it."

"So I thought," said Dick, "but it is your turn next, Claude, and here comes the chance. Another horseman, by Jove! The road is well frequented to-night."

From the same direction, that is to say, from countrywise, that the curate had come, they now heard a horse approaching at a rapid canter, and Claude Duval, finding that there was no time to lose, sprang out into the road, and called out—

"Stop, on your life!"

There was a scream, then, evidently in a female voice, and the horse was pulled up so quickly that it reared right on to its haunches, and then commenced plunging in evident fright.

Claude could just see that it was a female figure that was upon the horse, and seizing the opportunity to do so effectually, he dashed forward and caught the refractory horse by the bridle, and brought it to a state of quietness in a few minutes.

"Oh, sir," said the voice of evidently quite a young girl, "was it you who called out to me to stop, or have you saved me from that danger as well as from the more real one of a fall from my horse?"

Claude hesitated a moment, and then he said—

"I did call out to you to stop, but it was a mistake."

"A mistake, sir?"

"Yes, I took you for some one else, that is all. You are free to pursue your journey, if you please. Your steed is quiet now."

"Thank you, sir; but—but—you are not really a—a——"

"A gentleman, I hope," said Claude, as he slightly raised his hat, "having in all respects behaved as one to you. It is better not to inquire further."

"Sir, I thank you. Good night."

"Good night."

The young lady cantered on, and Claude went back to his friends and laughed, as he said to them—

"Another failure. It was a girl merely; so, of course, I let her go on without ever inquiring if she had any money with her. It really don't seem as if we were destined to do much good upon this road to-night, for there seems to arise some good reason for letting every one pass whom we may happen to stop upon the highway."

"Well," said Jack, "it is my turn next, however, and perhaps I shall have better luck than either of you."

"Hush!" said Dick. "Jack, you won't go single-handed upon the next adventure. Don't you hear?'

"Yes, the sound of wheels. It is a stage coach."

"Are you sure of that? Listen again. Perhaps, after all, it may be some private vehicle."

They all three now listened attentively, and they distinctly heard the tramp of four horses, and the heavy, grinding sound of the wheels of a vehicle of considerable weight upon the road; but if there had been any doubt at all upon the character of the vehicle that was approaching it would have been completely set at rest by the braying sound of a horn, that was evidently blown by the guard of the coach.

That it was a public vehicle that was now rapidly approaching was evident, and Jack at once said—

"Now you know it is a stage coach."

"We do,' said Dick.

"Yes," said Claude, "there cannot be any mistake about it now."

"What is to be done?" said Dick.

Jack was rather thoughtful, and evidently waited to hear what Claude would say upon the subject; and after the pause of a moment or two, he spoke—

"Here are three of us," he said, "and there is a stage coach coming along upon the road. It is evidently bound for London, and is likely enough to have in and about it passengers sufficient to make up the money that we want. If we can get that money by such a coup as stopping the coach at once, I think it is better than waiting here for perhaps half the night, and only falling in with such chances as have already come across us."

"That is true," said Dick.

"Why, yes," said Jack, "I cannot deny it."

"Then," added Claude, "what do you both say? Shall we attack the coach, or leave it alone?"

"Attack it," said Dick.

"Then," said Jack, "as I should be in a minority if I were to say no to the proposition, I won't; and, therefore, you may consider that I agree."

"On, then," said Dick, "for there is no time to lose. What is to be the order of the attack, Claude?"

"Anyhow you please, as far as I am concerned."

"Then, Jack, you stop the leading horses. I will keep the coachman and guard quiet, and you, Claude, see to the passengers. Will that do?"

"Perfectly well."

"Come on, then, for there are the lights of the coach already flashing on the herbage of the hedgerows."

To stop a stage coach with four good horses in it, going at its usual pace upon a country road, would, under ordinary circumstances, have been rather a difficult as well as a hazardous exploit; but when such a feat was done by any of the knights of the road they took good care to place themselves under such peculiar conditions that the thing was not near so troublesome to do as it might have been.

One of the most essential of these conditions was to be upon the aclivity of a hill, so that the horses were, at any rate, reduced to a walk nearly, and the difficulty of stopping them was very materially reduced.

This was precisely the position occupied by Claude and his two friends upon the occasion of stopping the Guildford coach.

The guard of the coach blew his horn again, doubtless for the purpose of warning any vehicle that might be coming down the hill of the close proximity of the coach, and then the horses were brought to a walk, and the broad glare of the lamps fell slowly and oddly enough upon the hedges and the trees on each side of the road.

"Are you ready?" said Dick Turpin.

"Quite," said Jack.

"Yes," said Claude, "I am quite ready."

"On, then, at once, and don't give them time to think about it."

Dick did not pause another moment, but giving his horse an impulse forward, he rode out into the middle of the road, and presented a pistol at the coachman, crying out in a firm, clear voice, as he did so—

"Pull up, or you are a dead man!"

Upon the impulse of the moment the coachman pulled up, and then Jack was at the heads of the leaders in another moment, and without alarming them at all took gently hold of one of them by the bridle, so that they understood they were to stand still.

"Oh, Lord!" said the coachman. "Here's no end of highwaymen stopped the coach, as I'm a sinner!"

"Guard!" said Turpin, "guard!"

"What now?" said the guard.

"You are very likely armed," said Dick, "and I only speak to warn you that we are in sufficient force to make resistance perfectly useless; so if you attempt to make any it can only have to you the effect of getting your brains blown out."

"Yes," said Claude, as he rode up to the side of the coach, "that is about it; and now that you understand your situation, your best plan will be to be quiet."

"Blaze away at 'em, Bill," said the coachman. "You have got a blunderbuss.

"Yes," said Bill, "but don't you hear, they are going to blow my brains out if I do? and as they are the only brains I have got, I don't seem to like it."

"You are a sensible man," said Dick.

"Thank you, sir."

"You are a coward, Bill," said the coachman.

"I know it," said Bill, "that's why I was made guard of a coach, you see, Joe, 'cos it wasn't supposed I would bring you and the passengers into any danger by useless resistance."

The coachman shook his head despairingly, and Claude Duval at once let down the window on the off side of the coach, and looking into the vehicle, he said—

"If there be any ladies here, they need not be at all alarmed, as no violence is intended."

"Violence, sir!" cried a voice. "What the devil is the meaning of all this? Coachman!—I say, coachman! go on, or I shall bring an action against your proprietors for delaying me on my journey."

"The coachman dare not go on, sir," said Claude, "and it is quite useless for you to put yourself in a passion. You will be so good as to deliver up your money, watches, and jewellery, if you please, and be quick about it."

"Murder!" cried a lady's voice.

"No, madam," said Claude, "there is no murder in the case."

"Why, good gracious, man! you don't want to rob us?"

"I do, madam."

"Why, it's a highwayman!" cried the man's voice. "Upon my life this is a pretty state of things. Here we are stopped by a highwayman. Sir Peter Brown!—Sir Peter Brown, I say! are you going to stand this?"

"Oh, yes," said a weak voice—"oh, yes, and a great deal more, if necessary. I cannot allow my serenity to be disturbed by my ideas of resistance; so, my good fellow, here is my purse. There are about forty pounds in it, to which, I'm sure, you are quite welcome, if you will be very quiet and polite in what you have to do."

"Thank you, sir," said Claude. "Now you, sir, if you please."

"But, bless me!" cried the other man, "I—I——"

"Confound you, sir!" said Claude, as he put the lock of one of his pistols in trim for firing. "You ought to be ashamed of yourself, to force me to fire into the coach, for somebody else may get hurt. Lean forward, sir, that I may get a good aim at you alone."

"Oh, no! The Lord have mercy upon me! Good sir, oh, don't—don't! There is my purse, and my watch. Oh, do go away at once, for I don't feel very well."

CHAPTER CCCXC.

THE GUILDFORD COACH PASSES COMPLETELY INTO NEW HANDS.

By the feel of the purse that was handed to him, Claude Duval had every reason to believe that it was tolerably well filled, so he was pretty well satisfied with the result of the attack upon the coach. The lady, who was the only other passenger in the vehicle, give such evident symptoms of being in hysterics, that Claude Duval said to her—

"Madam, if you wish to get rid of me you can do so at once, by handing me your purse. Come, be quick, now."

"Oh, give it to him," said the passenger who had been first inclined to bully Claude—"give it to him, and let him go."

"Yes," said the other, who was named Sir Peter Brown, as he calmly took a pinch of snuff—"yes, I think that will be the plan, madam."

"Take it—oh, take it. There it is, and my rings, too—my brooch—oh, my bracelets—oh—oh!"

"I don't want your jewellery," said Claude. "Good-night, madam; and I trust, gentlemen, you are much more frightened than hurt."

"Claude—Claude!" cried Dick.

"Yes, Dick?"

"Look down the road there! What is that?"

Claude did look down the road; and what he saw for a few moments had the effect of rather confusing him, for he could not make out what it was.

"What is it, Dick?" he said. "Is it a bonfire moving along, or what?"

"No, Claude, it is a strong party of mounted men, preceded by two bearing flambeaux. Don't you see them now?"

"Ah, yes, I do."

"We must be off. The only three outside passengers that there were to the coach slid down, and ran off. I let them go, as is my custom, pretending not to see them; but now they will give the alarm to those people who are advancing without a doubt, and we shall be taken if we don't mind."

"Hurrah! hurrah!" cried the coachman. "Now, my fine fellows, I rather think you are in for it, for I can see, if you can't, that it is a strong party of mounted police that is coming up the road. It is to be hoped you have made your wills all of you."

"Be quiet," said Claude.

"Oh, yes, I'll be quiet. Ha! ha!"

"Dick, we may yet baffle them."

"How? By flight?"

"Yes, partly, and partly by finesse. Will you see to my horse?"

"Certainly I will."

Claude dismounted rapidly, and then, rather to the surprise of Dick, he mounted on to the coach box, and snatching the reins from the hands of the coachman, he said—

"Get down, or you are a dead man!"

The coachman, seeing a pistol in the right hand of Claude, rolled off the box into the road in a moment, calling out as he did so—

"Bill—Bill, why don't you shoot him?"

"I'd rather not," said Bill. "Two can play at that game, you know, Joe. Is there anything I can do, sir"—addressing Claude Duval—"to give you any satisfaction?"

"Yes. Be off with you after the coachman."

"With all the pleasure in life, sir."

With amazing celerity the guard dropped from the roof of the coach on to the road; but he took his blunderbuss with him.

"Now, Dick," cried Claude, "you and Jack ride on in front of the leaders, and I will drive the coach. Off we go, and all's right."

"Good," said Dick. "I see now. It is the best plan in the world."

Claude touched the horses with the whip, and off they went; but at that moment the guard did a very desperate thing, for kneeling down in the middle of the road, he fired his blunderbuss after the coach, and half a dozen slugs with which it was loaded went, slanting upwards fortunately, right through the back panel.

The effect of this discharge was to frighten the old lady in the inside of the coach into a state of hysterics, and to blow off the hat and wig of Sir Peter Brown, while one of the slugs hit the irascible gentleman on the side of the nose, and reduced that prominent member of his face from an aquiline, of which he used to be very proud, to a snub.

"Confound the fellow!" said Claude, when he heard the discharge of the blunderbuss. "If I had not four horses to manage, I would let him know that such tricks were not to be played with impunity."

It was a good thing now for the safety of the coach and the inside passengers, and himself, too, that Claude Duval was a good whip, for the horses had become very much alarmed at the sudden discharge of the blunderbuss, and after kicking a little had fairly broke into a gallop.

Any effort to pull the cattle in for a mile or so would most likely have ended in the upset of the whole concern; so Claude acted upon the prudent plan of rather encouraging them in a gallop than otherwise, so that they soon got tired of it, and comfortably subsided into a good round trot of about nine miles an hour.

During the time that the horses had made such speed, Dick and Jack had got out of the way, and only kept up with the coach, one on each side of it; but now they resumed their position in the front, which would hide them from any one who might be coming after the vehicle.

Gradually, then, Claude pulled up, and said to Dick—

"Look down the road, and see if you can see anything of the rascals we expected after us, Dick."

"No. But there is a turn in the road."

"Turn? There is, and rather a sharp one too. I thought that we should have been upset at it."

Now, the passengers in the inside of the coach had been so confused altogether at the attack, that they were utterly unaware of the change of the driver that the coach had, and hearing some talking now, and feeling that after the mad way in which the coach had been going on that it had come to a stand still, the irascible gentleman whose nose had suffered pulled down the glass, and popped his head out at the window.

"Hilloa! hilloa!"

"What's the matter?" said Claude.

"Coachman! coachman!"

Claude guessed the mistake at once, and imitating the voice of the coachman as well as he could from hearing it only once or twice, he said—

"Here you are, sir. Hope all's right, sir?"

"No, you rascal, all's wrong."

"Sorry to hear it, sir."

"You sorry to hear it, you vagabond? How dared you submit to those rascally highwaymen in the way you did?"

"Couldn't help it, sir."

"You couldn't help it, you wretch? You know well that you could help it, and your duty was to help it; but I'll bring an action, sir, against your proprietors, sir, I will, sir, you vagabond; and I don't fell quite sure but what you are in the plot yourself, confound you!"

"Oh, dear, no, sir."

"But I say, oh, yes, sir! and I only wish I had hold of the rascals, now I have got my pistols out of my travelling vallise—where, somehow or another, they always are when I want them most—I would let them see that an Englishman's coach as well as his house were his castle."

"Yes, sir."

"Yes, sir, indeed! Curse you, sir!—that's what I say."

The irascible gentleman drew up the window with such violence, that it was a wonder he did not smash it at once.

"On again, Claude," said Dick, "they come—look!"

Claude gave one glance behind the coach, and then he saw the party with their flambaux advancing at a trot.

"No," he said. "It is better to brave it out, now. You both of you get into the shadow of the trees, and leave all to me."

"We will aid you," said Dick, "if there be any occasion."

"Yes," said Jack. "Trust us for that."

"I do."

Both Jack and Dick, now, got out of sight almost among the large overhanging branches of a chestnut tree, that grew by the road-side, and Claude put on the coachman's extra great-coat, that fortunately for him was upon the box. In the pocket of the coat, too, was a large red worsted comforter; and when Claude got that round his neck and the coat on, he was as thoroughly disguised as any one need wish to be.

He had just completed these little arrangements, when a party of twenty-five well armed and well mounted men arrived at the coach.

A man with a pistol in his hand, and who was evidently the leader of the mounted force, rode up to the side of the coach, and cried out to Claude—

"Hilloa! Mr. Coachman, have you been stopped on the road?"

"Oh, lor, yes, sir."

"Oh, you have?"

"Haven't I, sir, and my guard killed, and my passengers robbed!"

"Oh, indeed. I thought as much."

"My 'osses, too, sir, took fright, and off they set, and if I hadn't been as good a whip as there is a goin', though I says it myself as perhaps oughtn't, there would have been a regular upset, and no mistake."

"No doubt of it, the rascals. Did you know them?"

"Me, sir? Oh, lor, no!"

"Well, then, I can tell you that in all likelihood it was Claude Duval, and a couple of fellows who are with him, one of whom is the famous, Dick Turpin, on that four-footed devil, his black mare."

"Oh, sir, you don't say so?"

"It is so, in sober truth."

"Then we are all dead, sir!"

"Oh, no, you are not. I and my men will hunt Claude Duval till we find him; but we are off the scent just now. Do you know which way he went?"

"Yes, to be sure I do."

"Ah, indeed?"

"Yes, sir. You saw a lane just before you got to the turn in the road, by the old finger-post?"

"Yes—yes."

"Well, then, sir, he went down there along with some other fellows, and thankful enough was I when he did, for then I thought that we might be rid of 'em for to-night, at all events. I only wish, sir, you may catch him. I declare I'm all of a shake, but I don't think any of us are killed, sir, except my poor guard."

"We'll have the rascals—we'll have them. Thank you for your information, coachman, and you will hear of it again if we catch them."

"No doubt of that, sir."

"This way—this way," cried the chief officer, as he turned his horse's head in the contrary direction again. "This way, my men. Good-night, coachman."

"Good-night, sir."

Another moment, and the twenty-five officers were all on the gallop away from Claude Duval and his friends, as quickly as they could possibly go.

"Bravo!" cried Turpin, clapping his hands as though he were applauding at a theatre. "Bravo! bravo!"

"So say I," said Jack.

"Well, it is not bad," said Claude; "and now I have no sort of objection to bidding good-by to the Guildford coach. Where's my horse?"

"Here you are, all right, Claude."

"Thank you. But the best plan will be to release the horses from the coach, and let them trot quietly to town by themselves, otherwise the passengers may get upset, after all, and it will do us no good to expose them to any such dangers."

"None in the least," said Jack. "I'll manage it."

With his experience and tact with regard to horses, Jack in a very few minutes released all the four horses from the coach, and then away they trotted to town, not at all displeased not to have dragging behind them the vehicle, that was thus left alone in its glory in the road.

Claude Duval then mounted again, and going up to the coach door, he let down the blind, and said in quite an easy tone of manner as he looked in at the astonished passengers—

"There was a gentleman here who said he had got his pistols ready for me if I came again; and as I am here, perhaps he will explain what he meant by that remark about me."

"Oh, lord, no!" cried the irascible gentleman. "This is the devil himself!"

"If you are the same highwayman who before favoured me with your company," said Sir Peter Brown, "I beg to state that I have not had time to go home and get any more money."

Claude laughed and drew up the window again; and then turning to Jack and Dick, he said—

"Come, I rather think that we may now conclude this adventure to be settled to the satisfaction of all three of us; and the sooner we go from the coach the better."

"So say I," replied Dick.

"And I," said Jack.

"Come on, then. Where is my horse, Jack?"

"Here, Claude, and all right."

Another moment and Claude Duval was mounted again, and with his two friends on the road, ready and fearless for whatever might occur. They paused for a few moments, and the silence that was between them seemed as though it had something ominous about it. It was Dick Turpin who broke the silence.

"Claude," he said, "which way do you go now? Have you enough, do you think, to make it worth our while to try to carry out the little plan we thought of awhile ago?"

"Ay," said Jack, "that is it."

"I will soon see," said Claude, as he let the bridle of his horse go on to the creature's neck—"I will soon see about that. Perhaps you could let me have a match alight for a moment; for I think that there are notes in one of the purses."

"To be sure," said Jack.

"No!" cried Dick—"no, don't be quite so hasty. I hear nothing, but Bess does. Only notice her."

Turpin's steed was pawing the ground in rather a suspicious manner, and the creature's ears were projected forward so as to catch the slightest sound.

CHAPTER CCCXCI.

CLAUDE DUVAL FULFILS THE PROPHETIC FEELING OF HIS SOUL.

"WHAT does Bess mean?" said Claude Duval to Dick, after the pause of a few moments, during which they heard no alarm.

"She means that there is danger. You hold her for a moment, Jack, while I place my ear close to the ground and listen."

"I will, Dick."

Turpin dismounted and flung himself flat on the ground, placing his ear close to it, and after about half a minute's intent listening he rose, and springing into the saddle, he said—

"Claude, my boy, they are trying to steal a march upon us."

"How do you mean?"

"I am quite confident that a number of horses are coming along the road so carefully and slowly that they may be within a few hundred yards of us before we should under ordinary circumstances hear any sound of their approaching feet."

"Ah, say you so?"

"It is so. I cannot help thinking that they must have adopted some mode of more effectually deadening the sound of the creatures' hoofs upon the road."

"That may be done," said Jack.

"As how, Jack?" said Claude. "I don't see how on the spur of the moment such a feat could be accomplished."

"Oh, yes; I once tied a silk handkerchief over one of the feet of my horse, many times doubled, and it was surprising how it stilled the sound. But I have an opinion with regard to these advancing officers, which I think, if we do ever know the rights of the matter, is very likely to turn out the correct one."

"What is it, Jack?"

"Simply, that before they all got very far from here they met tht guard and the coachman, who have given the information, not strictly in accordance with what they got from us"

"It must be so."

"Nothing more likely," said Dick. "This will be our way, I take it. And now I seriously incline to get over the first practicable hedge we happen to come to and make our way into the open fields. So long as we continue upon roads, whether they be highways or byeways, we run the risk of encountering the officers."

"Be it so," said Claude.

They now, at rather a swift canter, for they thought that was the pace that would make the least noise on the road, which happened to be pretty hard just about that spot, went on townwards, until Dick Turpin, who was a little in advance, came to a portion of the hedge by the wayside which was of so straggling and imperfect a nature that there could be no sort of difficulty in crossing with the horses.

"This will do," he said.

"We follow you, Dick," said Claude, "for, if you recollect, you accepted the appointment of commander-in-chief, and I am still willing to concede it to you."

"And I," said Jack.

"No—no, that's all nonsense. You are our chief, Duval, and to you we both look. But that don't much matter; Bess I know can do this feat of leaping from the road into the fields, for she is well used to it, and, perhaps, after seeing her do it, your horses will follow."

As he spoke, Turpin just patted the neck of the beautiful creature he rode, and in another minute she had made a dash at the little embankment by the side of the road, and clearing the slight obstruction of a straggling alder branch or two, she was in the meadow beyond in safety with Dick Turpin.

"Bravo!" said Claude.

"Yes," said Jack, "it was beautifully done."

"Come on—come on. I don't know how it is so," said Dick, rather hurriedly, "but now that I am here upon the green sward I seem to hear the sound of horses' feet in this direction easier than I did even upon the road."

Thus urged, both Claude and Jack spurred their horses up the embankment, and they both got into the meadow rather gallantly.

"Well done," said Dick.

"Yes," said Jack, "as regards the scramble it is; but let us now listen for the sounds you heard, Dick."

Claude said nothing, but he bent his head down about on a level with the saddle, and with his hand at his left ear he listened intently.

A strange clanking sound came upon the night air. They all heard that.

"What is it?" said Jack.

"What is what?" said Claude, for he wanted to hear from Jack if he, too, heard the clanking sound.

"Why I don't know how to describe it, but if I didn't think it was not at all likely, I should say that there was a sound not unlike that which would be produced by military accoutrements."

"Yes, that's it."

"What's it, Claude?"

"We are pursued still by the officers, who, no doubt, have fallen in with the coachman and the guard or one of them, and by some means or another, too, they have got the aid of some military."

"Think you so, indeed?" said Dick.

"I do."

"Then there is no time to lose, and let who will be in command among us I say but one word, and that is, on—on!"

Dick did not stop to argue the matter, but off he set, and was quickly followed by Claude Duval and Jack. The meadow in which they were was certainly of considerable extent; but going at the rate they did they very soon cleared it, and then they came to a very low and easily scaled hedge which they got through in a moment, but to their mortification they found the field upon the other side was a ploughed one, and at every step the horses sunk above their fetlocks in the soil.

The labour of getting along this field at any speed was truly terrific; and after trying a canter, and a gallop, and then a trot, they were compelled to let the horses walk it, for fear of straining them, so that when they should get upon beaten ground they would be found lame after such an exertion.

Fortunately this ploughed land was not of very great extent, and when they emerged from it, they came upon a portion of grass that covered a long avenue, bordered by chestnut trees on each side.

The avenue really looked so artificial, that Claude Duval and his friends could scarcely bring themselves to think that it was other than a work of art.

The morning light was just beginning to show itself in the eastern sky now, and as a long pencil of grayish, strange colour shot up from the horizon, Dick waved his hand, saying—

"To cover! To cover! They come! On—on! Follow me!"

Without asking Dick for the special cause of this sudden alarm, or staying to look for it themselves, both Jack and Claude followed him closely up the avenue, and then they came to a row of iron hurdles, beyond which they could just see, looming larger in the morning light, several huge haystacks.

That they had come upon a farmyard, instead of keeping to the open fields, was now a fact too evident to dispute. But Dick did not hesitate a moment. Springing from his horse, he laid violent hands upon several of the hurdles, and succeeded in displacing them, and then he cried out in a sharp, quick, but yet suppressed voice, to his friends—

"Come on—come on! Concealment is our only chance."

While Dick Turpin had been displacing the iron hurdles, both Claude and Jack had had time to take a look along the seemingly artificial avenue down which they had come, and then they no longer doubted the wisdom of the hurried proceedings of their friend Turpin.

It so happened that rather a heavy gleam of light fell from the eastern sky round a little clump of trees at the commencement of the avenue, just after leaving the ploughed field, and that streak of light fell right upon the arms and accoutrements of about half a dozen lancers, whose gay equipage and martial appearance was certainly rather out of place in that seemingly peaceful region, in which the birds were just awakening to welcome the rising sun.

We may as well now state at once to the reader the cause of this sudden and truly alarming accession of strength to the attacking party.

The fact was, that the officers, with the exception of one, were all totally deceived by the assumption of the character of coachman of the Guildford Celerity by Claude Duval. That one officer, however, happened to know the coachman well, and he thought that there was a slight difference of tone that was rather odd.

It said a great deal, though, for the accuracy of Claude's sudden assumption of the coachman's character, that this man could only suspect that there was something rather odd in his friend's voice, without being able to pronounce positively upon the fact that it was not him.

After the party had ridden of, and taken the route that Claude had sent them upon, and which would have separated them from the coach further and further, this one suspicious officer communicated to the commander of the party his suspicions that they were being deceived in some way.

This brought the party to a halt.

After some parley, then, it was agreed to send six of the force still onwards by that route, while the remainder should go back and seek to overtake the coach again, and thoroughly satisfy themselves with regard to the identity of the coachman; and it was in the attempt to carry out this portion of their plan that, after reaching the road again, they heard a faint voice crying out—

"Hilloa! hilloa!"

Upon coming to a halt, and answering the cry, it was repeated, and then they followed the sound, till they came to the guard of the Guilford Celerity, who was lying in a ditch by the road-side, with his discharged blunderbuss still in his grasp.

A good shaking and some eager questions put to him by the officers, at once let him see that he was among friends; and then out came the whole affair, to the intense mortification of the officers.

Before they left the guard, for leave him they were compelled to do, since they had no spare horse for him, the six men they had sent down the turning came back into the road again, accompanied by a sergeant's party of Lancers, who were en route for the head-quarters of their regiment.

From this party they learnt that it was quite impossible three mounted men could have come by the route supposed, without passing them, and they repeated that they had met no one whatever for five miles or more.

Of course, putting all this together, the magistrate who was with the officers came to the tolerably sensible conclusion that he had been completely taken in by Claude and his friends. The only thought was how to repair the serious error into which they had fallen.

The magistrate, in the first instance, easily, by stating who and what he was, induced the sergeant in command of the five Lancers to lend him what aid he could in the matter, and the more especially as it did not now seem likely to take him out of his route.

Thus was it that the military force was once again enlisted in the service of the civil authorities against Claude Duval and his two companions and friends.

What will be the result of this combination, we shall quickly see.

It was arranged that the party should be divided in this manner.

The Lancers were to take to the fields, along with the six men who had met them in the cross-road, and to ascertain as they went along if any trace of the highwaymen was to be found, while the magistrate with the remainder of the party kept on the high-road, with the hope of driving the thieves off into the meadows.

All this had been executed with such speed as was possible, and carried out, and the consequence was, that Claude and his friends found themselves, as the reader is aware, with the Lancers and the six officers in the rear, the farm-yard and its dependencies in the front, and the road, no doubt, well taken care of by the magistrate and the strong force still under his orders.

We now return to Claude and his friends.

Their position, to them, did not seem quite so desperate as it really was, for they did not up to that point know of the division of the force that had been sent against them; and it was to their minds just possible that the people attached to the farm might befriend them in some degree, so that it was rather with hopefulness than otherwise that they paused amid the haystacks, and waited for the coming assault.

By dint of some exertion, they replaced the iron hurdles that had been cast down by Dick, for, at least, they would be some sort of protection against their pursuers; and it would not be a very easy thing to take them down, when exposed to the fire of the pistols of the highwaymen, as either the Lancers or the officers would be if they should make the attempt.

While all this was going on, the worst possible thing that could take place for Claude and his friends did occur, namely, the rapid approach of the morning, which happened to be a really fine and clear one. To them the light seemed each moment to be spreading itself over the sky, with a speed that was quite unusal with it.

"We shall be in broad daylight in another hour," said Jack.

"No," said Dick—"no. Don't say that."

"But look at it."

"Yes. But I think I have more experience in country matters than even you have, Jack, although you ought to know a good deal about it, too. Don't you see the mist in yonder valley thickening each moment? Look at it. It is only half-way up the trees."

"Ah, yes!"

"Well, then, my opinion is that in the course of the next quarter of an hour we shall have a white fog about us; and, if so, it will, I think and hope, be all to our advantage."

"It will," said Claude.

"Not a doubt of it," said Dick; "and as for these soldiers, I don't feel quite sure that they know we are on their route at all. But I see now how it was that we heard the seemingly muffled sound of horses' feet while we were in the road; for what we listened to was the tread of the cattle on the grass in the meadows."

By the actions of the Lancers and the officers of police who were with them, the supposition of Dick Turpin that he and his two friends were not known to be so close at hand, seemed to be pretty well verified.

They came on till they were within a couple of hundred yards of the farm-yard; and then Claude distinctly heard the order to halt.

In the clear, fresh morning air, then—although it was pretty evident that the white mist covering it had not yet come—the voices of the sergeant of the Lancers and the principal of the officers came clearly upon the ears of Claude and his party.

What they heard induced them to think that everything might be gained by keeping quiet; so they descended and led their horses round the haystacks, and, pulling out a few handfuls for them, they left the creatures to amuse themselves; while they themselves peered round the corners of the stacks, and alternately watched their foes, and listened to what they said.

CHAPTER CCCXCII.

CLAUDE AND HIS FRIENDS HAVE A SERIOUS BATTLE IN THE FARM.

It would seem that the sergeant of the Lancers, although he had not liked to refuse his aid to the magistrate who had requested it—and, indeed, he did not feel very clear but that the magistrate had the power to demand his co-operation—did not seem to be very much pleased with the duty he was upon.

Claude and his friends could hear him, in rather a burlesque sort of way, speaking to the officers.

"Well, Mr. Officers of Police," said the sergeant, "I don't see that we are doing any good now. Here we are close to a farm-yard. What are you disposed to be at, now?"

"Confound the fellows!"

"Ah, well, so say I. But it is of no use our staying here and swearing, you know. Show me what I can do, and I will try and do it. But it seems to me that we are on the wrong track."

"It does look like it."

"Well, what is to be done?"

"I suppose we must take to the road again, and see his worship, and ask him what he would have done."

"Well, come on, then. I don't think you will catch these fellows you are after this bout, at all events."

"I never did think we should, sergeant."

"Indeed?"

"Oh, dear, no. You don't know that Claude Duval—if, indeed, it be he, and not the devil himself. He is as cunning and as brave as half a dozen people put together."

"Well, I only wish he would come into our regiment. They say we shall be off to the continent to fight the rascally French soon; and he is just the sort of fellow I should like to ride next to, if all is true that is reported of him, and I suppose a good lot of it is."

"I think it, too."

"Well, then, it's understood that we are to make our way into the road again, is it?"

"Yes, I suppose so."

Now Claude Duval and his friends began to congratulate themselves that all was well, and that in another five minutes the Lancers and the officers would be past the spot, and so they would, but for one of those little malapropos accidents upon which the lives and fortunes of men seem at times to turn.

Just as the sergeant was giving the orders to his men to clear the way through the hedge to the road there arrived in the farm-yard a great thick-headed-looking man in a smock-frock, rubbing his great sleepy eyes as though he had just roused himself for the day, as, indeed, he had, for his duty was to feed a considerable number of pigs that were close at hand.

"Oh, lor! oh, lor!" he said, "what a thing it is to have to get up of a morning. I don't so much mind it after one is up, but it is a horrid thing to have to get up when you are sleepy. How I should like to stay in bed for a week and have a lump of fat bacon brought me now and then, and a jug of master's old ale!"

The yokel had just got so far in his soliloquising, when his eyes fell upon three horses quietly at work upon a haystack, and pulling out portions of it with the greatest perseverance.

"Hilloa!" he cried in a voice that rang through the place again. "Hilloa! master! Oh, won't I have you all in the parish pound, and no sort of mistake! Master! Oh, I say, can't you leave off? Master—master! here's some cattle got at the hay. Hilloa! master—master!"

"Villain!" cried Claude Duval, as he sprang at the fellow and held him by the throat with a grasp of iron. "Another word, and you are a dead man."

Alas! it was too late. The fellow had said words enough not only to reach the homestead, but the officers and the Lancers, too. From the house there was at first no notice taken of the cries of the swineherd, but the officers pricked up their ears; and although they could not tell exactly what was amiss, the mere fact that there was something was quite sufficient to induce them to inquire into it.

"Sergeant, did you hear that?" said the chief officer.

"Oh, yes."

"Well, I think it's worth looking to."

"So do I, if you want to catch your men."

"Then you think that—that——"

The sergeant nodded only.

"That will do," said the officer. "Come on. Forward, all of you. Something strikes me we shall have them, after all."

Just as the Lancers and the officers came up to the iron hurdles at a trot, the farmer, who had been aroused by the cries of his swineherd, reached the other side of the farm-yard.

"What's all this about?" he said.

"Peace!" said Dick Turpin. "You and all your family had better consult their own safety by keeping within doors. There is likely enough to be some rough work here."

"Rough work?"

"Yes; be warned in time."

"Well, but, as this is my farm-yard, and as these are my stacks, I rather think I have a right to be here."

"Shoot him," said Jack.

"Well, it will save trouble, to be sure," said Dick, as he presented a pistol at the farmer.

Neither Dick nor Jack had the least intention of shooting the man; but the effect upon him was complete, for with a yell of fear he turned and ran back to his house again as hard as he could.

"Now," said Claude, as he let go the swineherd, "you follow your master, and keep out of harm's way. You have done quite mischief enough for one day; but I don't want to take your worthless life."

Quite delighted at his escape from what he had only a few moments before looked upon as certain death, the swineherd galloped off after the farmer; so that the place was clear of them, although the much greater danger remained, in fact, as the Lancers and the officers were rapidly approaching.

"Dick," said Claude, "what is to be done?"

"I'll be hanged if I know,"

"Can we not escape?" said Jack, as he placed his foot in the stirrup of his horse.

"I don't see the way."

"Nor I," said Dick. "Here we are, and we must fight it out. We are to some extent strengthened here by the stacks and the iron hurdles; but I don't see any way out of here but across the yard, and into the house, and then we should just have to hold a kind of siege, which would be fatal in the end."

"It will be fatal," said Claude, "to one in any way."

Jack and Dick looked at each other significantly; and then Dick sprang to his horse with a feeling of desperation, as he said—

"A fight here between three men and the force opposed to us would be madness. I say, let us try and get away to the left here into the road through every obstacle. It appears to me that there is merely a kitchen garden to get through and a paling to cross, and there we shall be. Come on, Claude. Mount and follow me!"

"As you please," said Claude, as he sprang upon his horse.

Jack did the same, and they made a dash past the haystacks to a little deserted piece of ground; but the getting there had two effects, which at once dislosed the operations of the party.

From that direction they ran into the road, and there, not very far off, was the magistrate and his party returning, and evidently looking for the glitter of the arms of the military, as they could be seen through the trees.

The second effect that that movement had was to mark them to the Lancers and to the officers, who with one voice called out—

"There they are—there they are!"

"Lost now, I think," said Jack.

"Back to the stacks," said Dick. "While there is life there is hope."

They ran back in a moment to their old position, and then again they dismounted, just as the Lancers came up at a trot to the iron hurdles, closely followed by the officers.

"Dick and Jack," said Claude, rapidly, "let me give myself up."

"Give yourself up?"

"Yes, upon condition that you two go free."

"Never!"

"Never!"

These two answers came sharply from the lips of both Jack and Dick; but Claude Duval looked at them both, and spoke in a tone of melancholy seriousness, saying—

"I know that you do not like the idea of such a thing, but let me beg of you to entertain it. I may have many chances of escape afterwards, but now only look at our situation."

"Say no more," said Dick, "I won't listen."

"Nor I," said Jack.

"We live or die together."

Claude bowed his head in silence, and a sort of shudder came over his frame, after which he looked up coolly and calmly, and with an expression of great beauty beaming upon his face, as he said—

"Be it so. We will fight to the last; and if they gain a victory over us they shall not say it was a bloodless or an easy one."

Dick and Jack could not but look at Claude Duval as he spoke, and they thought they had, in all their long acquaintance with him, never seen so strange an expression upon his face as it then wore.

That time, however, so rife with danger as it was, was not one in which there could be any meditations upon Claude's looks, for they heard the sergeant of the Lancers suddenly cry out—

"Halt!"

Then, to the surprise of his two friends, Claude Duval walked leisurely forward for a few paces beyond the haystacks, and facing his foes, he said—

"Well, what is it?"

"That's our man," cried the officers with one breath. "That's Claude Duval. Seize him—seize him! That's the rascal!"

The Lancers looked at each other and then at their officer doubtfully, and then the sergeant glanced at the police, saying—

"Well, if that's your man, take him."

"Claude Duval," said the chief officer, "I summon you to surrender in the name of the king. I have a warrant against you, and if I had not, it is quite lawful to apprehend you, and you must see that resistance is quite out of the question. I warn you."

"Rather," said Duval, "let me warn you."

"Of what?"

"Of the certain fate that will be yours if you don't be off at once."

"Oh, stuff! That won't do at all. Now, my brave fellows, go in and win. Take him alive if you can, but if you can't, just give him a poke with one of the lances, and that will answer the purpose very well."

"You had better surrender," said the sergeant to Claude.

"No."

"Well, I can't help it."

"Shoot him!" cried the chief officer, for he felt that if an affray really took place the likelihood that he would come out of it in a whole skin was not very great; therefore, he would have been glad if Claude Duval were to be shot at once.

"No," said the sergeant, "none of that. Go and take your man, and if there is any risk we will aid you; but it is quite absurd of all of us to go in upon one man."

"There are three of them," said the officer. "The other two are close at hand."

"You don't know that," said Claude.

"Where are they, then?"

"Look for them in the fog."

The object that Claude had in view in engaging his foes in talk was to let the white mist, which was coming rapidly from the valley, reach the spot, and even as he spoke it came in dense wavy clouds, enveloping horse and man in its fleecy embrace.

The moment Claude saw that such was the case, he stepped back, saying as he did so in a loud, clear voice—

"Come on now, at your peril. The first man who lays a hand upon the iron hurdle, will be a corpse ere he can take it off again."

"Take that, then, and be hanged to you," said the chief officer, as he drew one of the holster-pistols, and fired it at Claude.

Duval's hat was blown off his head by the shot; but before he could think of returning it, there was the sharp crack of a bullet from Jack's pistol, and the chief officer, with a cry, fell from his saddle, and his horse galloped down the avenue half mad with fright.

The officers huddled together, and cried out to the soldiers to take Duval and his friends, for the fall of their chief had given them a sort of panic. The sergeant of the Lancers, however, took things quite easy.

"Dismount!" he said to his men.

In another moment every saddle was empty.

"Protect the horses," he then added. "This affair must be done on foot."

The soldiers thrust their lances into the turf, and fastened the horses to them, and then stood in rank, waiting for further orders.

"Take them alive, if you can, my men," said the sergeant; "but cut down all who resist. Draw sabres! Forward! March!"

The situation of Claude and his friends was now in truth one of the most critical that could well be imagined. They had no wish to take the lives of the soldiers; but after the orders they had heard given, it was but a course of self-defence to do all the harm they could.

CHAPTER CCCXCIII.

AN UNEXPECTED ALLY COMES TO THE AID OF DUVAL AND HIS FRIENDS.

With the air of men who feel that they had rather a disagreeable duty to do, but which at all hazards must be done, the Lancers marched towards the iron hurdles. It was then that Duval cried out in a loud voice—

"Halt, if you value your lives!"

"Give them a volley from your pistols," said the sergeant.

Five pistol-shots whistled past the heads of Claude and his friends.

"Load!" said the sergeant.

"Fire!" cried Claude.

At the moment he and his two friends returned the fire, and two of the soldiers fell by the iron hurdles.

"Forward!" shouted the sergeant, and he sprang over the hurdle close to him. Claude bounded forward, and seized him by the arm and throat, and tossed him back again as though he had been a truss of straw.

The police officers at this moment poured in a volley of pistol-shots against Claude and his friends; but the salute was returned, for Dick had knocked down one of them with a hedge stake he had found, and Jack had wounded another. There was [illegible] was unhurt, and he prudently retreated clear of the hurdles, finding himself in such an emergency as he was.

The fog and the smoke from the firing mingling together, prevented the officers on horseback from seeing how the soldiers were getting on; and they kept cheering to them to encourage them.

Then it was that Dick, seeing that if the fight continued they must certainly be worsted, laid hold of Claude by the arm, saying—

"Follow me—follow me! Come, Jack—come. I think there is a chance yet."

Claude made no answer, but followed him hurriedly through the farm-yard, and so did Jack. They came to an ivy-covered porch of the house, and there they found that the fog was not so bad; and Dick was in the act of trying to force the door open, when a little girl, of about twelve years of age, came up to them, crying, and saying—

"Oh, is it you they came to kill?"

"Yes."

"Then come this way, and they shall not.—Come, come, before grandfather sees you. They shall not kill you! Oh, do come!"

In wonder they followed the child across the yard to the right; and she opened a little gate and led them into a flower-garden, and so on to a corner of the house where there was an open door.

"This way!—oh, this way!" she said. "I saw all from the window of my little room, and they tried to kill you, I know. They killed my poor brother, did the bad soldiers, and they shall not kill you! He was a soldier: but he wanted to come home and love us all again and be happy: but they would not let him, and so they shot him. Do you want to go home and be happy?"

"Yes," said Dick.

"And they won't let you?"

"Just so."

"Then I will save you! I am but a child, I know; but I can do more, and just because I am a child, than any one else can do now for you."

"That is true," said Dick.

"Hark!" said Jack—"hark!"

"Forward!" cried a voice—"forward! This way! They cannot have escaped us altogether."

There was then a rush of many feet; and then the little girl took Dick by the arm and led him through the open door and up a little flight of steps to the upper floor of the house. There was a long and dreary-looking passage upon that floor, from which opened various rooms; and into one of them the little girl went, followed by the three stalwart men, whom she said she would save.

This was something like the fable of the lion and the mouse, in which the latter, with all its weakness, aids the former, with all its strength, to elude its foes.

"Come in," said the child: "this is my chamber. They let me have this room to myself entirely, and I alone keep it neat and clean. There is my little bed—there is my little work-table that my aunt gave me; and, you see, I have some books and some flowers. Now, do you think if you hide in this room and I sit reading here so calm and still, like a little nun, that anybody will think you are here?"

"Certainly not," said Dick.

"We are saved!" said Jack. "Don't you think so, Claude?"

Even as Jack put this question to Claude Duval, that personage tottered, and would have fallen but that a little couch that was in the room fortunately was close to him; and he sank upon it with a deep groan.

"Good God," said Jack, "what is this? Light—light! Draw the blind, and let us have some light."

Dick Turpin, when he heard Jack speak in this way, did not speak a word, but in two steps he crossed the little room, and reached the window. A green blind was across it, which enveloped everything in the apartment with a mysterious kind of halo. With one movement of his hand, Dick Turpin removed this obstacle to the early daylight, and then it streamed into the room, and upon the face of Claude Duval.

One look at that pale face, upon which death had set its seal, was enough for both Jack and Dick.

Poor Claude sat upon the little couch, with his right hand upon his breast, and every vestige of colour had fled from his face. His very lips were of an ashy paleness.

The little girl was much alarmed, and stood trembling by the window, gazing at that awful face.

"Claude—Claude!" said Jack, "what is this? Oh, speak to me, I implore you. What is the meaning of it?"

Dick Turpin said not a word.

Then it was that, with an evident effort, Claude Duval smiled in a strange fashion, and holding out his other hand to Jack, he said—

"Jack, old friend, it is nearly over now."

"Oh, God, no!"

"Hush! Jack, hush! They have done for me at last, old friend, Do not think much of this little accident. It was sure to come to this some day. Dick, are you there?"

"Yes, Claude," said Dick, as he snatched up his hat, which he had laid upon the little table. "Yes, I—"

"Stop. Where would you go? Oh, don't leave me now, either of you."

"You are wounded," said Dick, "and I would get surgical aid for you."

"No—no; oh! do not."

"But it may save your life."

Dick moved towards the door; but Claude clenched his left hand, and in a firmer voice he said—

"Dick, if ever you had the slightest feeling of affection for me, you will stay now with me, and not go upon the fruitless errand you speak of. I know that no human aid can avail me now; my minutes are numbered. But do not let them take me in life, if you can help it."

Jack had staggered back to a chair, and with both his hands clasped over his face, he rocked to and fro in quite an agony of grief.

There was a something about the tone in which Duval spoke that brought even firmer conviction to the mind of Turpin that what he said regarding the utter uselessness of surgical aid was but too true, so Dick laid aside his hat again, and slowly walked up to Claude. Looking him earnestly in the face, he said to him—

"Duval, old friend, tell me—is it a bullet?"

"Yes, Dick."

"And where?"

"So near to my heart that it is quite near enough, Dick, to end my career. It's all over! Hark! what is that?"

The sound of voices in the house came upon their ears; and a look of deep distress came over the countenance of poor Claude.

"Oh! my friends," he said, "for you both there is hope! I was selfish when I asked you to stay with me. Flight may yet save you. Go—go, and leave me! I can but die once!"

"Never!" said Dick, as he drew a pistol from his pocket and stood by the side of Claude's chair with a determined aspect. "I, too, can but die once, and I am willing to do so in your company, Claude; and woe be to the man who first tries to lay a finger upon you!"

Poor Jack still rocked to and fro in helpless grief.

The sound of voices came nearer and nearer still to the corridor.

Then it was that the little girl stepped to the door, and opening it quickly passed out of the room. Dick looked a little anxiously after her, for he was afraid that the courage of the child had deserted her, and that she would go and throw herself upon the protection of her friends, and disclose who were in the room she called her own. But such was not the case: in a few moments the girl returned.

"They are searching the house," she said.

"Then all is lost!" said Dick.

"My good friend," said Claude, and he spoke still fainter now than he had done before, "it is a chance for you, and for you, dear Jack. This window is not far from the ground."

"No, no," said Jack; "I will not leave you!"

"Nor I!" said Dick, firmly. "Jack?"

"Yes, Dick?"

"Your pistols! We will all die together, if it must be so. Your arms, Jack! Don't submit easily. The most timid animal in all the world, if hunted to the covert, will turn upon its foes. Be a man, Jack!"

"I will—I will!"

Jack sprang to his feet, with his hair dishevelled, and looking scarcely less pale than poor Claude. With cautious eagerness he took a pair of pistols from his pocket, and pointed them both towards the door of the room; and then, in a strange, cracked voice, he said—

"Let them come!—let them come! Let the bloodhounds come for their prey! Ah, they will find me ready for them! Life for life! They shall rue the day they struck down the noblest heart that ever beat in human bosom! War to the death! Let them come!—I am prepared! and, oh! that I could single out the hand that did the deed!"

"No—no!" gasped Claude, "not this—not this. I did not mean this."

"Cease to talk," said Dick. "I see that it only exhausts you the more, Claude. I will not yet abandon hope of your recovery."

Claude shook his head.

"This way, then, if you will go into every room," cried a voice in the corridor; "but I tell you they couldn't come into the house without some of the family being aware of it."

"Don't be too sure of that," said another voice, in rough and surly accents. "A pretty piece of business this has been, to be sure. No less than three of my men killed by it."

"Well, but highwaymen must be caught," said another.

"Oh, confound your highwaymen! I only wish they had been down your throat before I and my men came across you."

This conversation was between the sergeant of the Lancers and the chief officer, and it was the former who had made the remark about the impossibility of Claude and his companions getting into the house without having been seen by some of the family.

"They come," said Claude. "God! they come, and I so helpless."

"Not helpless," said Dick, "while Jack and I live. Be firm, Jack."

"I will—I will."

CHAPTER CCCXCIV.

THE LITTLE GIRL PROVES HERSELF TO BE A TRUE HEROINE.

It takes us longer to tell of these stirring and startling events than it took for them to be enacted; but that is a necessary condition of nature.

When the sound of voices in the corridor struck upon the ears of the young girl who had already done what seemed to be all that it was in her power to do for Claude Duval and his friends, a flush of excitement came across her cheeks, and glancing round the room, she clasped her hands together in seeming despair.

Then, with a bright flush of hope upon her face, she sprang to the side of the couch upon which Claude lay, and said in a low tone so that it might not be heard without—

"There is still something to be done."

Claude shook his head.

"Oh, yes—yes, but there is."

"Yes," said Claude, "one thing only. Take a dying man's blessing. If it does you no good, my dear child, it will do you no harm."

The girl looked at Claude for a moment, and the tears swam in her eyes as she did so; but the voices came again upon the silence of the house, and the necessity for immediate action came strongly to her mind.

With a celerity, and a power of action that was little to be expected from her age and sex, she took from where it rested, partly against the wall and partly around the head of her little bed, a tall covered screen, gaily papered with flowers, and placed it round the front portion of the couch, which it completely hid.

"There," she said. "Behind that you will all be safe."

"Alas, my dear," said Dick, "do you, indeed, think that so frail a screen as that, will protect us from those who seek our lives?"

"I do."

"She is right," said Claude, faintly—"she is right. The darkness, too, is grateful to us. Come—oh, come. It is a chance."

The girl looked eagerly from one to the other of them, and then in the corridor the tramp of the heavy footsteps of the officers, and of the sergeant of the Lancers and his own men, who where in fit state to come with him, came nearer and nearer still.

There was evidently no time to be lost, if they would attempt even to take advantage of the chance of concealment afforded to them.

"It may do," said Dick. "Come, Jack."

"To the last—to the last!" said Jack, in a tone of abstraction. "Let them come, I will fight them to the last."

"Jack, you know not what you say," said Dick, taking him by the arm. "Come this way, there's a good fellow."

"No—no! I have to defend Claude, and this is my place. Over my corpse alone shall they reach him."

"But you mistake. You will be the destruction of him."

"Let them come!—Oh, let them come!"

"Claude, call to him," said Dick, "if you possibly can. Your voice only will have any effect upon him."

"Jack—Jack," said Claude. "I want you, old friend."

"Yes—yes. I am here—I am here!"

Jack stepped behind the screen, and Dick followed him.

"Hold my hand in yours, Jack," said Claude, "and don't leave me: Help me to lie down very quietly—quietly. Oh, God!—Ah, yes—more quietly still. God bless you both."

They gradually let Claude sink down upon the couch, and Jack held the hand in his that was disengaged, for the other was still pressed upon his heart.

Behind the screen, now, there was a gloom almost approaching to darkness, so that it was only in a dim sort of fashion, that Dick and Jack could see each other. But they felt how critical was there position, for in the course of a few moments there came a tap at the door of the room.

Preceding that tap at her room door, the little girl had sat down by her work-box, and opening it, had taken out some unfinished sewing, and, although her little hands shook again, she did her best to seem to be quietly at work.

The tap came to the door again, and then she, with as firm a voice as she could possibly command, called out—

"Yes—who is there?"

"Lucy! Lucy!" said a voice. "Are you up?"

"Yes, grandfather, I am up."

"Open the door then, child."

"Come in, grandfather. The door is not fast. Come in. I'm only doing a little work."

The girl's voice shook and quivered as she spoke, notwithstanding all her efforts to appear calm, and then, fearful that the expression of her face would betray her, she darted from her seat, and succeeded in drawing the little green curtain right across the window again before the door was opened.

This was a bold manœuvre of the girl's, for it placed the room in such a state of semi-darkness, that those who came from a strange light could not possibly have the chance of noticing that she was very pale, and that tears were in her eyes, and that her very lips quivered with emotion.

The door opened, and the farmer made his appearance.

"Oh, yes, you are up and dressed, Lucy," he said. "All's right. Don't you be at all alarmed, my dear, but there are some gentlemen looking for some thieves, and they don't seem to be satisfied till they have looked into every room in the old house."

"Thieves, grandfather?"

"Yes, my dear. Did you not hear a disturbance?"

"Oh, yes, but I didn't know what it was all about."

"To be sure not. How should you? Well, gentlemen, here is my little grandchild's bed-room. I suppose you don't exactly expect to find Claude Duval and his friends hid in her work-box, do you?"

The chief officer and the sergeant of the Lancers just appeared on the threshold of the room and glanced in. Lucy rose from her seat, and faced them with more boldness than one would have thought her capable of.

"Oh, grandfather," she said, "why do you bring these men here? This is my own little room, as you always told me."

"My dear, I can't help it. They will soon go."

"Oh, yes," said the officer. "You sleep here, do you?"

"Yes, sir."

"Oh, well, there's no use wasting time bothering here. Come on, sergeant. Sorry to have troubled you, my little dear, but we couldn't help it. Come on. This is only waste of time."

"So I should think," said the farmer, as he closed the door of the room again, leaving Lucy with the three highwaymen.

The girl burst into tears, then, when the door was shut, and was about to say something, but it was as well she did not, for it was opened again in a moment by her grandfather, who popping his head in, said—

"You can come down when you like, Lucy. We shall have breakfast soon, my dear; but don't you be frightened."

"No—no, I am not."

"That's right. But how dark the room is."

"I prefer it, grandfather."

"Oh, very well—very well. Now don't you be alarmed, for the people who are in the house will go soon."

"Yes, grandfather."

The door was again closed, and again Lucy felt that there was another reprieve for those whom she had chosen to throw the shield of her protecting innocence over.

While these extremely peculiar movements were proceeding, Dick Turpin had stood close to the couch on which lay Claude. A pistol was in each of his hands, and if the screen had been attempted to be moved aside there is very little doubt but that both the chief officer of the civil power and the sergeant of the Lancers would have met their death; so that, after all, the little girl was as much entitled to their gratitude, if they had but known their danger, as she was to that of Claude Duval and his two friends.

But soon the retreating footsteps of the searching party were lost as they descended the stairs to the lower part of the house, for Lucy's room had been the last they had searched in the corridor, and the little creature felt that to a great extent the danger was now over, and that she might speak freely.

"They are gone—they are gone!" she said.

"Yes," said Dick, "and so far all is well. We owe to you our lives, and I don't know what to say to you to express what I feel upon the occasion."

"Nor I," said Jack. "How dark the room is."

"Yes, it is, Jack."

"It is the window blind," said Lucy. "I will soon remove it again. There, you can see better now."

"Move the screen, Dick," said Jack.

"Stop," said Dick. "Has your room-door a fastening, Lucy?"

"Yes—oh, yes. I will lock it."

The girl went to the door, and just as Dick heard the sharp click of the lock he doubled up the screan that was before the couch upon which Claude Duval lay.

"Now, Claude," he said, "let us hope that you are better. The danger is past, and who knows but, after all, we may only have to recount this along with others of our peculiar adventures?"

"Do you hear, Claude?" said Jack.

Dick suddenly knelt down by the side of the couch and looked in Duval's face. Then a strong emotion shook him, and clasping his hands, he said—

"No, Jack. He does not hear. He will never hear again! He is dead!"

"Oh, God, no—no! Not Claude—not my friend—my only friend, oh no! Dick—Dick, don't say it. Light—more light!"

Jack dashed the screen cautiously aside, and then he lifted up the head of Claude. One glance into the calm, cold, passionless face was enough. Serene in death lay Claude Duval. A slight—a very slight smile seemed to curl the upper lip, and that was all. It was quite evident that that daring and adventurous spirit had fled without a pang.

Jack dropped to the floor as if he had been shot, and did not move for many minutes.

Dick Turpin, although much cut up by the death of Claude Duval, yet had about him more presence of mind upon this occasion than poor Jack had, and he removed from the breast of the corpse the right hand which even in death there continued.

The moment that hand was out of the way, Dick saw that poor Duval had received a bullet as nearly as possible over the region of the heart, and the only wonder was that he had lived so long as that he had had the indomitable firmness to prevent any great sign of the agony he must have suffered to escape him.

A very small portion of blood had oozed from the wound and saturated his clothes just around the spot, and his hand was soaked in blood; but there was nothing else to show the violent death to which he had come at last.

"It is all over," said Dick. "Farewell, poor Claude!"

Dick took his own hat, and tied it gently over the face of the corpse, for he saw Lucy close to the window looking much alarmed, and he was afraid that the look of the dead face would alarm her still more.

"My dear young friend," he said to her, "you have no cause for fear. We who live will not leave you, and he who is no more cannot, if he would; and were he still in life he would risk it for you twenty times. We owe you much—oh, so much! and now I know not how to ask you to do still more for us."

"I will—I will," said Lucy, sobbing. "What is it?"

"I don't know whether you can do it or not, but do you think that there is any chance of us being able to stay here in peace till night?"

"Oh, no—no."

"Well, I hardly thought it possible."

"It is not possible," said Lucy. "My grandmother will be here twenty times in the course of the day. Oh, no, no! I would if I could; but what can I do?"

"Nothing—nothing! Jack—Jack, I say—be a man!"

Jack slowly rose, and shudderingly looked at the couch.

"Rouse yourself!" said Dick. "It is true that our old friend is gone: but he is at peace! Think of that, Jack. There will be no more rewards for him, dead or alive. Cupidity, with cruelty and malice in its train, will never again start to hunt him to the death. He has now no fears of chains or cells, nor of the gallows-tree. The vulgar multitude, who would have made high holiday at his execution, will have no chance to do so now. He is dead; and he has died, I am sure, a much less painful death than many thousands who would execrate his name. He has gone to his God, Jack, where he will be judged more from what he thought and what he meant than from what he seemed to do, and where the good deeds of his life are written by recording angels; while the tears of gratitude of the widow and the orphan, whom he has oft cherished and aided, will blot out even the memory of his crimes!"

Jack looked at Dick while he spoke; and, as he did so, a change came over his face—a change from all the agony of deep grief to serenity of soul. He took Dick's hand in his, and shook it.

"Thank you, Dick," he said—"thank your brave heart! Thank you! I did not think of all that. You knew Claude better than I thought you did. I thank you from my soul, Dick, for those kind words; and they are so true, too. I am much better—oh, so much better, now!"

CHAPTER CCCXCV.

THE FUNERAL OF CLAUDE DUVAL.

Poor little Lucy listened to what Jack and Dick was saying with the most intense interest; and then she plucked Dick by the sleeve, saying—

"Sir?—sir?"

"Yes, my dear? What would you say?"

"You do not know my grandfather. He is at times rather a stern man, they say, and he has not a good temper; but he has a good heart, for all that, and he will not be unkind to you."

"Think you so?"

"I know it. Now, if you will let me go to him and tell him all that has happened—how you sought shelter here—how your poor friend is dead, and how much you both loved him, and how cruel it would be to bring death and danger to you both, do you think that there is anybody in the world who could be so unkind as to say nay to you?"

"She speaks truth, Dick," said Jack. "We must throw ourselves upon the kindness and the consideration of this family."

"Be it so," said Dick. "But stop a moment, Lucy—stop a moment: you shall not go empty-handed. Here is gold. Nay, do not turn aside and refuse it, but give it to your grandfather or your grandmother, whichever you think will like to have it the best; and tell them that we consider it only a poor payment for the shelter we ask till night for the corpse of one whom we love well, and whom we would not desert even in death."

"Yes—yes," said the little girl, "they will be kind, but I cannot take the money."

"It is not for you," said Dick. "Believe me, Lucy, I have seen enough of you to feel that you would not take money for doing a kind action."

The eyes of the child filled with tears.

"But," added Dick, "it is possible that the world may have altered the feelings of your friends in that particular, even if they were once like yours; so take the money, and if it has no other effect it will have that of convincing your relations that we have no evil intentions towards them, and that by affording us the shelter we ask they run no risk of our leaving our dead friend a burthen to them."

"Yes, yes—take it," said Jack.

Thus urged, the little girl took the money, and with a countenance full of sympathetic feeling she glided from the room upon her mission of gentleness to the farmer and his wife.

The officers and the Lancers had left the house after, as they all thought, as efficient a search of it as it was at all possible to make, and not a little amazed were they at the seemingly mysterious disappearance of the three highwaymen.

"Dick," said Jack, as he pointed to the corpse of Claude, "did you—did you, Dick——"

"What, Jack?"

"Did you close poor Claude's eyes?"

"No—no. I thought of that, but could not."

"I am glad you did not, Dick."

"Are you glad, Jack? Oh, yes, I understand you. It is a last sad office that you would wish to do for one whom you knew so well in life as Claude."

"It is, Dick."

"Then, Jack, I honour the feeling, and am glad that I did not interfere with what I feel is your prerogative, my good friend."

Jack stepped up to the couch, and with a gentle and reverent hand he removed the hat that covered the face of the corpse.

There was nothing in the smallest possible degree repulsive in the look of Claude Duval. You might, had you seen him lying upon that couch so very calm and still, have really thought him sleeping. To be sure there was something of a strange colour about the face, and Jack thought that that colour was deepening upon it even as he looked at it.

Gently and sorrowfully Jack closed the eyes of the corpse and placed a half crown piece upon each one. The coins upon the eyes of the dead man gave the face a strange look, but Jack did not heed that. His heart was full of the reminiscences of the past as he looked in the face of his old friend and companion.

"There is one," he said, "who has gone to the grave before you, Claude, to whom, had she lived to see it, this would indeed have been a dreary day. You and I and all of us mourned for her when she went to death; but, after all, it was a happy thing that she took the dark and dreary path before you did, Claude, for had she lived, I would not have looked into her face this day for the wealth of worlds."

"You are right, Jack," said Duval.

"Yes, it is so—I know it is so," said Jack.

Poor Jack then lifted the coverlet from the bed, and laid it gently over the still form that lay upon the couch.

The coverlet slowly sunk to the shape of the body, and was awfully suggestive of what was beneath it. With a shudder Dick turned to the window, and in silence looked into the garden beyond it. Then there came upon the morning air the lowing of cattle, and the cackle of the feathered inhabitants of the farmyard, as they aroused themselves for the new day. The mist that had swept up from the valley was gradually dispersing before a bright beam of sunshine that had broken through the mazes of a darkening cloud.

"Morning," said Jack, as he stood by the side of Dick. "It is the blessed and beautiful morning; but all is night to him who there sleeps the long sleep that knows no waking."

"Don't say that, Jack. Perhaps, even while we look upon that still form, the brighter and nobler essence of its nature has awakened in a region where there is no night."

"I should like to think that, Dick."

"And don't you?"

"I don't know exactly. Sometimes I do, and sometimes I don't."

"Well, Jack, that is a subject upon which we will talk at another time. Do you hear the sound of footsteps in the corridor?"

Jack started.

"I do—I do. They come as foes or friends—it don't really much matter which to me now. I never in all my life felt so very indifferent to my life."

Dick stepped between Jack and the door, and his hand was plunged into the breast of his apparel. Most probably it grasped a weapon of defence, for it was impossible he could tell in what kind of spirit the people of the farm were coming to that apartment.

The voice of the little girl now came upon their ears, and what she said rather tended to increase the doubt regarding the intentions of the farmer than otherwise.

"No—no, grandfather," they heard her say, "you must not. It is so very wrong. I said you would not—I said I knew you would not, and, indeed, you must not."

"Pho—pho, child," said the farmer, "you don't know what you are talking about. Hold your tongue, do now."

"Yes," said rather a shrill, peevish voice. "Children can't be supposed to know, so don't be so vain and silly, Lucy, as to try to set up your little judgment against ours. A pretty thing, indeed, that would be!"

The door of the room was now opened, and the farmer and his wife appeared upon the threshold of it. Dick advanced two steps, and in a tone of clear and firm decision, he spoke.

"Hark you, sir," he said, "I don't know your name, or I would address you by it; but I do hope that for your own credit in particular, and the credit of human nature in general, you will listen to the voice of feeling and of humanity, and ratify the promise which this child has made to us in the purity and in the innocence of her young heart."

"Oh, sir—oh, gentlemen," said the farmer, as he made a low bow, "don't mention it, I beg of you."

"It's not the smallest trouble," said the woman executing a curtsey, "I assure you, gentlemen."

"Not the least," chimed in the farmer. "I'm quite sure, anything that I can do, or my missus——"

"Yes, me or my good man," added the wife, "we will do with all the pleasure in life."

"That we will," said the farmer.

Dick and Jack were quite amazed at this rather extraordinary, and overdrawn politeness on the part of the farmer and his wife; but Lucy soon furnished a key to it, for, with tears in her eyes, she said—

"They took the money—they took all the gold; but I cannot, and will not think that they mean to keep it."

"Silence, child," said the grandmother. "Dear me, how children's tongues do run on to be sure, don't they, sir?"

"Hush! will you?" said the farmer. Upon my word, Lucy, I don't know what has come over you to-day."

"But the money, the—the——"

"Say no more about it," said Dick Turpin. "I am very glad if the few guineas I sent are of any service."

"Service!" said the farmer. "Oh, my dear sir, you can't think how bad the times are for farmers. They always are, I rather think, for you see, sir, when we have bad crops, we can't, of course, sell so much as we would wish; and when we have good crops, the difficulty of keeping up the prices is quite terrible; so what with one thing and another, sir, the agriculturist almost always has something to grumble about; and as for the guineas being of service, I beg to assure you, sir, that they are of the greatest possible service."

"Yes," said the wife; "and if you think our services worth a few more of them, I'm quite sure it isn't for humble folks like us to say no to your generosity."

"Grandfather," cried the little girl, "do not—oh, do not act in this way. You will surely be sorry when you come to think of it in the time to come. Don't you know, that what is asked of you is nothing that is worth money—nothing that ought to be sold like your corn and your turnips, grandfather? It is kindness and good feeling, not goods. You cannot, and ought not to take the money."

"Oh, you aggravating child!" said the grandmother, "is this the return you make for all our kindness to you?"

"Let me," said Dick, "put an end to this discourse, by at once declaring, that I and my friend here would much rather you kept the money than not. We are quite satisfied with the arrangement, and will double the sum we have already given you if you will keep faith with us, and aid us in what we wish."

"Oh, yes—yes," cried the farmer.

"Double it?" said the wife; "why, then, we've nearly forty guineas, as I'm a sinner!"

"Quite forty," said the farmer.

"Then we will promise," said Dick, "to make it forty more."

CHAPTER CCCXCVI.

NIGHT AT THE FARM HOUSE—THE OLD CLOAK.

However poor Lucy might be shocked at the mercenary conduct of her grandfather and grandmother, Dick Turpin and Jack were better pleased that it should be so than otherwise, unless, indeed, the feeling of sympathy, which might possibly have dictated a kind course of conduct towards them, had been very complete and perfect indeed.

Such not being the case, however, they felt that the next best thing was to feel sure of the farmer and his wife through their avarice, and therefore was it, that from the moment Dick saw how greedily they appropriated the money he had already sent, and hinted at how very agreeable it would be to get still more, he was quite satisfied that he and Jack not only saw no possible risk in the house than they could screen them from, but that everything would be done that they might wish as regarded the disposal of the mortal remains of Claude Duval.

"You will be content," said Dick, "with that sum?"

"Oh, yes, quite—quite," said the farmer.

"Yes, my good gentlemen," said the wife. "We are much obliged."

"Oh," said Lucy, "I don't like this."

"Lucy," said Dick, "you ought to like it, when I tell you that it suits us well."

"But it is not right."

"Yes, yes, it is quite right enough, so don't cry."

"Cry indeed," said her grandmother. "I only wonder what she has got to cry at. But children, of course, sir, don't know the world as you and I do."

"Indeed, they do not."

"Ah, dear me," said the farmer, advancing towards the couch, upon which lay the corpse of Claude Duval, "and so it has come to this, has it? and here lies the body of your poor friend, gentlemen. Well, it really is too bad to hunt human beings as if they were nothing in the world but foxes come to steal your poultry. I always set my face against such things, that I do, and I hope I always shall."

"And what can we do, gentlemen, to accommodate you?" said the wife.

"Dick," said Jack, "we will stay here in this room."

"Yes, Jack."

"You tell them, then."

"Listen to me," said Dick. "We wish, when night shall come again, and that it may come soon we earnestly desire, to take our dead friend further into some shady spot, and inter him beneath some tree, so that we may know the spot, and that while we do so, we may please ourselves with the idea that he will mingle with the earth undisturbed by any one."

"Yes," said Jack.

"If, therefore, you will take care that no one comes to this room to interrupt us during the day we will remain here, and at night we will relieve you of all further trouble by taking away this sad sight."

"And a—a—then—a——"

"Then what?"

"The other forty guineas?" said the farmer.

"Them you shall have when we leave the house, without fail."

"Then, gentlemen, I am quite satisfied. You shall have every attention during the day, and whatever you like to order, I'm sure. My wife will cook you anything you like, and I daresay Lucy will wait upon you with cheerfulness."

"Oh, yes," said Lucy.

"Be it so," said Dick; "all we shall want will be a loaf of your country bread, and some water. We are in no mood for eating; but yet we feel the necessity of preserving our strength for what we have to do."

"Yes," said Jack, "that is it."

The farmer and his wife, with a profusion of bows, professed now the most unbounded sympathy with what had occurred, and they heaped such loads of abuse upon the officers and the military who had aided them, that it was quite terrible to hear them do so; and, if possible, Jack and Dick were more disgusted at all this mock show of commiseration than they were at the downright selfishness and mercenary grumbling feeling that had before characterised them, and which was still in the ascendant, their fine talking being only another manifestation of it.

With some difficulty they got them to go away, and leave them alone in the room with the dead.

It was in truth a long and weary day that which Dick and Jack passed together in that chamber. They had some discourse together about the past several times; but none at all of the future. That was a subject they seemed to avoid by mutual consent until poor Claude should be under ground.

The long-expected night, though, came at last, and then upon one of the visits that Lucy paid to the chamber, Dick said to her—

"Lucy, did you hear or see anything of our horses?"

"Oh, yes; they are feeding by the haystacks, and they are all three now in the stable; but—but——"

"But what, my dear?"

Lucy was silent.

"Nay, now, this is unkind of you," said Dick. "I feel quite sure that you have a something to tell us, and why do you not do so?"

"Yes, I have a something."

"But you do not like to say it?"

"In truth I do not, and yet I feel that I ought. I heard my grandfather say to my grandmother something about the horses."

"Come, now, what was it?"

"He said—'They don't know, I daresay, what has become of their horses, so we will not say anything about them either, for they are worth a good hundred pounds each, and to sell them will be the making of us.'"

"That's rather too bad, don't you think so?"

"It is—it is, indeed."

"Well, don't you mind it. Our horses we will and must have, but there is no occasion to make any disturbance about them just yet. However, upon one of the horses there was rather a large cloak rolled up, and strapped to the back of the saddle. That cloak we want."

As he spoke, Dick gave a glance to the couch, and Lucy comprehended at once what the cloak was wanted for. It was to wrap the dead in.

"You shall have it," she said; "but there is something I want you to do."

"What is it?"

"I want you to trust Harry Brown."

"Harry Brown?—Who is he?"

"He is a boy on the farm here, but he is a good boy, and you may trust him, and if you do trust him he will be a great help to you. If you will let me tell him all that has happened, and then let him come to you, you may depend upon him quite as much as you can upon me."

"Do so, then," said Dick. "I shall be glad to see him."

Little Lucy's face quite brightened up at the permission to tell all to Harry Brown, who we may suppose from that was a very great favourite of hers, and she left the room in a moment, as though she dreaded that Dick or Jack might retract the permission they had given her.

"What noise is that without?" said Jack, suddenly.

Dick stepped to the window.

"It is rain," he said.

"Ah, rain, is it? Oh, yes, and I hear the rustling of the wind past the window, and the dashing to and fro of the tree-tops. It is a gusty and a stormy night, Dick."

"It is, indeed."

"Well, Dick, you have heard the old rhyme, I suppose?

"'Happy is the bride that the sun shines on,
And happy is the corse that the rain rains on.'"

"Yes," said Dick; "I have heard of it, Jack; and if the rain pleases you, I shall be glad of it."

"Thank you, Dick; but believe me, I am not quite so superstitious, after all, as you and as poor Claude used to think me."

"No, Jack, I never thought you so."

"Did you not? Well, it is kind of you to say so. Dick, we—we will bury him as deep as we can."

"Yes, Jack."

There came a slight tap at the door now, and upon permission being given, it was opened, and Lucy said—

"Here is Harry Brown."

A very handsome country lad stood upon the threshold of the room.

"Come in," said Dick.

"Yes, sir, I am here," said the lad, "and Lucy has told me all."

"And are you willing to befriend us?"

"Oh, yes, quite so."

"Very well; then, do you know where to lay you hand upon our horses?"

"I do, indeed."

"That is well, Harry Brown."

"Yes, sir, and Lucy said you wanted the great-cloak that was strapped to one of the saddles, so here it is."

"Many thanks both to you and to Lucy for your kindness, I did want it. Here, Jack, here is the cloak. It has covered our old friend many a time from wind and from weather, and it will make as good a shroud for him as he or we could wish."

"It will," said Jack.

"Now, Harry Brown," said Dick, "I will just tell you what sort of help we want from you. At the hour of twelve we mean to carry out our dead friend to the long avenue of trees close to the farm-yard, and there bury him, so we shall want you to get us a couple of spades and a pick-axe, you see, and a lantern, and when the funeral, if we may call it such, is over we want you to bring us the horses to the spot where we dig the grave. Do you understand?"

"Oh, yes, it shall be all done so."

"We thank you from our hearts, Harry Brown; and remember that we trust you with our lives, for if you chose to betray us we should soon, perhaps, be even as our poor friend is who lies so cold and still yonder."

"He will not," said Lucy.

"Indeed I will not," said Harry Brown, "and if you have the least thought that I would do such a thing I am very sorry that you trusted me at all."

"We have no such thought," said Jack. "Do not suppose that we have any such thought. Lucy answered for you, and that is quite enough for us."

This assurance satisfied Harry Brown, and with Lucy he left the two friends alone in the darkness of the chamber with the dead.

Waiting thus, some hours crept slowly on, until a distant church clock, in a pause of the storm of hail and rain that now and then dashed past the window of the room, struck the hour of twelve.

"It is time," said Dick.

Jack started from his knees by the side of the corpse.

CHAPTER CCCXCVII.

THE BURIAL OF CLAUDE DUVAL, AND THE PRESET TO HARRY BROWN.

THE evening, which had set in with such strong demonstrations of bad, had by no means played the part of a false profit with regard to what the night was going to be.

Such a stormy night for the season of the year could hardly have been looked for. The rain, at times, came down in perfect torrents. The wind rushed sweeping by the homestead and wood, and yelled among the trees as if it were a living thing.

There was a secret pleasure in the mind of Jack to find the elements of nature in so disordered a mood upon that night, for they seemed more to harmonise with his desolate feelings than as if all had been calm and serene.

"Dick," he said, "can you see?"

"No, but I expect Harry Brown here with a lantern soon."

The sound of footsteps in the corridor came upon their ears, and there was a flash of light, and the farmer himself appeared at the door of the room.

"Oh, gentlemen," he said, "I have heard that Lucy has told my boy Harry to help you; I assure you he is a good lad."

"So we think," said Dick, "and we will accept his aid."

"I am here," said Harry.

As he spoke, the boy advanced with a lantern in his hand, and close to him came Lucy with a little red cloak on her and the hood drawn over her head as though she intended going with them to the interment of poor Claude.

"Why, Lucy," said the farmer, "what is the meaning of this, child? You won't surely leave the house to-night?"

"Yes, grandfather."

Dick looked at her for a moment in silence; and then he said—

"The rain is falling, Lucy, and the wind is boisterous. Do not come."

"Oh, let me!" she said. "You know I knew him while he was alive, and one of his best smiles and kind looks was for me. He shook hands with me before he died; and so I think him a friend, and seem as if I ought to follow him to the grave. It is not the rain or the wind that will stop me in such a duty."

"Let her come," said Jack, in a voice of deep emotion. "If the spirit of poor Claude could look down upon us—as who amongst us will say it cannot?—it will be well pleased to see such a mourner by his grave. So I say, let her come."

"Be it so," said Dick.

"Well, but," said the farmer, "I really ——"

"Nay, my friend, let her have her way," added Dick. "I request it of you."

"Oh, well, in that case ——"

"That will do. Now, Jack, help me. Harry, the light."

Harry Brown stepped with them up to the couch. Over and over again they wrapped the body in the large cloak; and then Dick took off his cravat, and tied it round, so that the cloak could not come off easily. The farmer hurried about the corridor in evidently rather a scared condition; for he was goggling his eyes fearfully, and shaking in every limb.

"Now, Jack," said Dick, "we will carry him between us."

"Yes, Dick."

They lifted the body from the couch.

The procession was a very strange one. First went Harry Brown with a lantern, and then came Dick and Jack with the corpse. Then came little Lucy with her red cloak; and the farmer sometimes followed her, and sometimes walked by the side of her, and seemed in fear and apprehension about something.

Perhaps he was in an agony about the forty pounds? We hope not; but we are very much afraid that was the case.

In this way, then, they went along the corridor and down the stairs, and so on round into the garden. Oh! how the rain beat upon their faces; and how the wind tore and roared around them, as though wild and angry at the proceedings it in vain tried to thwart.

Harry Brown held up the lantern, and by that guide they went; and being, as of course he was, so well acquainted with the farm and all its intricacies, he led them by the shortest and the nearest route through the garden, and so on by a little paddock and a gate that avoided the farm-yard and the row of iron hurdles—close to which poor Duval had received his death-wound—right to the entrance of the long avenue of tall and beautiful trees.

This avenue, owing to the wind taking a decided direction at right angles to its length, was very much protected from the violence of the storm of wind and rain; so that when they all got safely into it it had the appearance as if that spot were screened from the rougher influence of the weather, which respected the solemn duty the mourners came upon.

And now Dick looked about him; and seeing that they were close to the foot of a gigantic old elm tree, he said, in a low tone, to Jack—

"Will this spot do?"

"Yes, Dick. Yes."

They slowly placed the body on the ground.

"Harry Brown," said Dick, "we shall want the spade and the mattock."

"They are here," said the boy, "I brought everything you could wish to this place some hours ago, for I thought I should have to help you with the light, and so on, when you came yourself with the body."

"Many thanks. Now, Jack, we will dig poor Claude's grave."

"Oh, yes, yes," said Jack.

It was quite evident, from Jack's manner, that his mind was wrought up in some wonderful way to go through with the sad task he had set himself, and that there was no sort of likelihood of his giving way at it. Dick had a dread of what might happen when the reaction of feeling took place in poor Jack's mind when all was over.

Harry Brown brought them the tools for making the grave, and then he placed the lantern on the ground, at the head of the corpse, and stood there with his arm round Lucy's waist to support her.

"Can I help you, gentlemen?" said the farmer. "Dear me, I feel as if I ought to help you as much as I can, considering what you have promised to give me before you go." This was a hint to them not to forget, and Dick took it as such, for, turning to the farmer, he said quietly—

"We never forget what we promise; but we would rather dig the grave ourselves."

"Much rather," said Jack.

They now set to work in earnest, and after first carefully taking off the turf, so that they could use it again to cover up the spot, they began to dislodge the earth, and each shovelful that they took up for some time they cast as far from them as they could, for they knew that else they would not be able to leave the grave, as they wished it, level with the surrounding turf, without leaving a mound of mould outside.

It took a weary time to dig the grave: but the exercise was good for both Dick and Jack; and it is to be hoped that it had the effect, in some measure, of dispelling some of the dreary feelings that filled, at times, the mind of the latter.

At length they had the grave to their mind, and then they rested from their toil, and stood upon the brink of it. There was a solemn stillness now, for the wind had gone down a little; and the rain only came in a straight stream, pattering from leaf to leaf of the old tree, at the foot of which the last house of Claude Duval was made.

"It is done," said Dick.

"Yes—yes!" faltered Jack, as he wiped his brow.

Jack moved to the body, and signed to Jack to help him, and they lifted it gently up; and, partially holding by the cloak, and partially by the ends of the cravat that Dick had wound round it, they let it into the grave.

Then Dick lifted his hat from his head; and they all shuddered as they stood by the grave.

"Farewell!" said Dick—"farewell, Claude Duval! We commit you to the earth! You had your faults—as who of us is without? But to a merciful Heaven, that searches deeper into human hearts than we can do, we leave you! There are those who will plead for you at the throne of All-grace; and One who knows us best, knows well that your faults were none of the worst; and so you may have hope of the life to come."

"Amen!" said Jack.

"Amen!" said Lucy, in a low tone, and she clung to Harry Brown.

Then Dick took a shovelful of the earth and cast it into the grave, crying—

"Come, Jack, our work is not yet done."

It was at this moment, then, that Jack raised a shriek of agony, and called aloud to the dead—

"Claude—Claude! my friend—my brother!—oh, more than twenty thousand brothers are you to me!—oh, God, give him back to me, and take this wretched life for his! Claude—Claude, come from the grave, and let me look upon you once again!"

"Jack," said Dick, "be a man."

"I am—I am; but I am but a man. If I were more or less, I might be calm, but I am only human! Claude—Claude, come back to me again! Oh, Dick, what if he be not dead?—what if we have been too hasty? Claude, speak to me! 'Tis I, your old dear friend, calls to you!"

"Come—come, Jack," said Dick, taking both his hands in his. "Let me implore you to be calm. This is but a paroxysm of feeling and will pass away. For my sake, and for your own, be calm. Claude is happy in death. Why should we even call upon his spirit in such a fashion?"

"It is over," said Jack. "I—I am calm now."

"That is well."

"Yes, Dick—yes; but—but——"

"What would you say?"

"You saw him—eh, Dick? He was dead?"

"Oh, yes, Jack. Banish that delusion, I pray you."

"Yes—yes, I will. Forgive me, Dick, for giving you all this trouble. Come—come, what am I to do?"

"Help me, Jack, to accomplish this sad duty."

"Yes, I will—I will."

They shovelled in the earth upon the body, and the grave slowly filled higher and higher still, till it was near to the level of the earth. They then very quietly patted it down.

"You should jump upon it," said the farmer, "and it will go ever so far lower down, I can tell you."

"Wretch!" screamed Jack, as he aimed a blow at him with the spade, "would you ask me to jump upon his remains? Villain—murderer!"

"Stop, Jack—stop," said Dick. "Let him be. He did not mean anything of the kind in an unkind spirit. Let him be."

"But it shall not be done!"

"Certainly not. There, we will manage without. See, now, all is flat, and ready for the turf."

They replaced the turf, and to that operation Harry Brown lent a hand, so that it was soon done; and so Claude Duval was buried, and the rain from the saturated leaves of the old tree fell like tears upon his grave.

"It is done," said Dick, as he threw down the spade.

"Yes, it it done," said Jack. "Oh, God, yes!"

"Jack—Jack!"

"I am calm, Dick. Don't scold me."

"Farmer," said Dick, "here is the gold we promised you."

"Oh, really gentlemen, I'm quite sorry to have to take it. I hope you may never want it, upon my word I do; but, you see——"

"Silence! Where are our horses? We each had a horse when we reached this place."

"A horse, gentlemen, had you?"

"Yes, and you know it."

"Oh, dear me! Well, is it possible! Didn't anybody see 'em? Well, I never! A horse, did you say?"

"Three horses," said Dick. "Where are they?"

"Why," said Harry Brown, "they were in our stable, but they are now under the shelter of one of the haystacks, quietly eating, I hope, and I can bring them in a minute or two to you."

"You wretch!" cried the farmer; "what do you mean by that? Oh, you ungrateful boy! you villain! how dare you say anything about the horses? Oh, I'll kill you, I will!"

"No you won't," said Dick.

"I will—I will!"

The farmer made a movement to go up to the boy, to execute some of his threats against him; but, with such an expression upon his face as the farmer's better judgment, if he had any, might well shrink from, Dick interrupted him, saying—

"Lay but a hostile finger upon that lad, and you die upon the spot."

"Die upon the—a—spot? Oh, Lord!"

"Yes. Be warned, I beg of you, for I can assure you that we are in no sort of humour for trifling."

"Oh, well, I—I really——"

"Silence!"

"But I didn't mean indeed——"

"Oh, never mind him," said Harry Brown, "I don't care whether he turns me away or not. I can always get work to do."

CHAPTER CCCXCVIII.

THE CONCLUSION.

Both Dick and Jack felt a little distressed when they heard Harry Brown say this, for it led them, of course, at once to the conclusion that he foresaw his own discharge from the situation he had in the farm.

"No—no," said Dick. "This must not be. It is not fair, Mr. Farmer, to sacrifice the boy to any malevolence you may have against us. I beg that you will not do it."

"Oh, no—no," said the little girl, "he surely will not, and cannot be so cruel."

"I don't care a jot," said the boy. "I work, and work hard, too, for all I get in this homestead; and to the one who does so, the favour or the disfavour, the passions or the caprices of employers are as nothing. What is it to one who does his duty, and gives, as too often is the case, to some testy and stupid employer forty shillings' worth of real work for every twenty shillings he receives, what that employer chooses to think? He can't take away our arms, and while a man has them, is he not independent?"

"You rascal," said the farmer, "this is the gratitude I get from you, is it by keeping you in my service all the time I have?"

"Gratitude? Stuff!"

"Oh, dear, me! this is the way of the world," added the farmer. "I have had the boy with me for two years, and see how he treats me now. Oh, dear—oh, dear!"

"And he did not suit you?" said Jack.

"Eh?"

"I say, he did not suit you?"

"Oh, yes, he did, though."

"Well, then, what on earth has he to feel grateful for? I rather think you ought to feel grateful to him."

"Harry," whispered the little girl, "don't say too much, for if you do, I, too, shall lose you."

This was a view of the subject that had not occurred to Harry Brown while his blood was up from the unmerited reproaches of the farmer; but when now, it came at once across him in all its terrors that he would lose the society of the dear girl whom he loved so well, he certainly felt shocked at himself for having gone so far in the tone of defiance with which he had treated the farmer.

Dick Turpin saw the effect that a few whispered words from the little girl had had upon Harry Brown, and he could well guess what they must be to produce such an effect; so stepping up to Harry, who was looking very crest-fallen, indeed, he said—

"Harry Brown, I don't think you need regret what you have said. On the contrary, it is just as well that you have defied the farmer in the way you have."

"Think you so, sir?"

"Yes. There are very many natures who always behave the better in proportion as they are so treated; and I should not at all wonder but that after this night the farmer will think more of you than ever he did."

"I hope he may, sir."

"And so do I," said the girl. "It is quite impossible, though, that he or any one can think too much of Harry Brown."

The young creature in saying this, uttered nothing but the really genuine sentiments of her heart. She did believe that there was nobody in all the world to be compared to Harry.

Far from smiling or being displeased to hear her speak with such enthusiasm of her young lover, Dick Turpin was glad of it, and turning to the farmer, he said—

"My good sir, neither I nor my friend choose to take the trouble of coming to any conclusion with regard to what you have said of our horses. It is sufficient for us that they are to be found, and are even now forthcoming; and it will be much better for you to say no more upon the subject. Harry, you know where our steeds are?"

"I do."

"Then let us have them, and we will be off at once from this place."

The farmer had seen enough to know and to feel that it was quite madness to say anything more about the matter; and anything in the shape of an apology, or an attempt to explain away what he had said, would inevitably tend to make matters worse; and he had the prudence to hold his tongue.

No doubt, though, the man whose cupiditity had been so strongly awakened by the thought that he would get possession of the steeds of the highwaymen, was deeply mortified to find such a capital source of profit slipping through his fingers in such a way; but, as there was now no help for it, he could only utter divers groans, and bite his lips in silence.

Harry Brown, with alacrity, ran to fetch the horses; and, in the course of a few moments, he brought all three of them to the brink of poor Claude Duval's grave.

"Here they are," he said; "and I have taken upon myself to say that they are none the worse for being here for the time they have. I have taken good care that they are well fed and groomed; so that they are all three as fresh as so many daisies."

"They are, indeed," said Dick, as he patted the neck of his superb steed; and then he said—"Jack, just step this way a moment. I wish to speak to you, if you please."

"Yes," said Jack. "What is it?"

They whispered together for a few moments; and then Jack said—

"Yes, be it so; I am perfectly willing, Dick. It may be the making of him, for all we know."

"Will you say it?"

"No, no—you."

"Very good."

Upon this, Dick turned to the farmer and his little niece, and to Harry Brown; and, addressing them as a group, he said—

"I believe my friend here,"—indicating Jack—"has satisfied you, Mr. Farmer, by paying you all that has been promised you?"

"Oh, yes—yes," said the farmer, in a great hurry, for fear the sum he had stipulated to receive would be mentioned, and so get to the ears of Harry Brown—"oh, yes, I am quite satisfied upon that head. Say no more about it."

"Very good. As for you, my dear, kind, good girl,"—to the little niece—"I can only return my sincere thanks; but I am quite sure that you desire nothing more."

"Indeed I do not."

"Nor do I," said Harry Brown. "We are both quite repaid, and it has been a great pleasure to me to be of service to you."

"No, Harry Brown," added Dick. "My friend and I are not going to let you off so nicely as all that."

"Let me off?"

"Don't look surprised. We are but two of us now. He who was with us, and whom we so deeply regret, lies now in the cold and silent grave. What good will his horse be to us?—none at all; so, Harry Brown, as some slight expression of our grateful feelings to you, we give the creature to you."

"Give it to me?"

"Yes. Take it."

"It is well worth a hundred pounds," said Jack, "and I advise you to sell it for no less a sum."

"Oh, gracious goodness!" cried the farmer, "you don't mean that, gentlemen? Why, what is the good of the horse to Harry Brown? If, now, he were a farmer, it would be quite another affair. I will accept it in his name, if you please."

"Oh, no, no!" said the little girl. "I think Harry had much better accept it in his own name."

"Silence, miss! I will have you well corrected when you get home."

"No," said Harry—"no, you won't, sir. Beware of the consequences of any bad treatment of the girl. I daresay these two gentlemen will have the goodness to call at some odd time or another if ever they should be near to this place, and inquire how we both get on."

Dick quite understood that Harry Brown wished him to frighten the farmer with an idea of a visit from them; so he said—

"That we intend to do."

"Oh, dear—oh, dear!" said the farmer; "but the idea now of giving a horse worth a hundred pounds to a lad who is earning his half-a-crown a week and his victuals only! Oh, it's really dreadful to think of, it is, indeed!"

"Take the horse, Harry," said Dick, "and sell it. Much good may the money do you, as I am pretty sure it will. If you are very careful of it, such a sum as that mentioned may possibly be the means of placing you in some position of life which may be the high road to that independence which you so well deserve."

"I will take care of it for her sake," said Harry, as he glanced at the young girl.

"Do so. You could not possibly have a better incentive to well doing than your love for one who so well deserves all the affection you can possibly bestow upon her."

As he spoke, Dick took the bridle of poor Claude's horse, and placed it in the hands of Harry Brown, saying—

"He is yours: take care of him."

"Yes," said Jack; "and when you sell him, be a little careful, though, that he goes into kind hands."

"I will—I will, indeed."

Dick and Jack now mounted their horses, and they seemed to be upon the point of riding off; but yet there was a host of struggles in their minds, which prevented them from quite so easily leaving the spot of earth where Claude Duval lay in death.

"Come," said Dick, "this will do, Jack."

"Yes—yes, I am coming. Oh, Claude—Claude!"

"Jack, you promised you would be firm."

"I am—I am! Harry—Harry Brown?"

The boy sprang to the side of Jack's horse in a moment.

"Will you," added Jack, in a tone of emotion, "take what care you can that the grave is not disturbed? I do not ask impossibilities of you, but only as far as you can, you know."

"I will, indeed."

"And I will plant some flowers upon it," said the girl.

When Jack heard this, he turned to speak again, and to say something that should convey to the young creature how grateful he felt to her for that kind thought, but he could not speak, so he merely waved his hand, and then galloped down the avenue.

"Farewell!" said Dick.

In another moment he, too, was off; and before he could reach Jack, the latter had got to the end of the avenue, where they would either have to get through the hedge into the high road, or to go over the ploughed field again, which had proved such a distressing thing for their horses.

"Hold, Jack!" cried Dick. "Let us to the road, my friend. This way—I see a gate."

Jack obeyed the call of Dick, but he said nothing. A white gate, that each moment became whiter and whiter as the morning dawned, was close at hand; and Dick dismounted, and, with the aid of a large stone that he found, he broke the padlock that fastened it, and swung it open. Leading, then, his own horse through it, he said—

"Come on, Jack; there is no danger now, I think, for our enemies seem to have left this spot."

They passed through the gate, and then it swung shut with a heavy clang behind them, and Dick mounted again. As he did so his face was turned towards the east and he saw that the coming dawn was already with rare and singular beauty tinting the horizon with many strange colours.

"See, Jack," he said, "this night, with all its terrors and all its griefs, is already over."

"It is," said Jack.

Dick was glad to hear him speak at all, although it was in rather strange accents that he did so. It was in vain that Dick tried to get a glance at his face; Jack's hat was pulled down so far over it that that was not possible.

They cantered in silence for about the space of two miles, looking at the advancing sunlight, and discovering that soon some great changes took place in the face of nature.

In a long streak, that must have been some hundreds of miles in extent along the horizon, there came a gleam of stange, greenish-looking light, which shed its reflection across the meadows and the trees that lay beside the road on which Jack and Dick were.

After a time a slightly yellow tone seemed to take possession of the lower edge of this streak of light, and then it vanished and threw up into the air long pencils of light, that had a very beautiful, though rather a cold effect.

A lark in the meadows close at hand awakened and went up—up—up into the sky till it caught a glimpse of the sun, and then it began to awake solitude with the sweet melody of its voice; and from every tree and every bush there came the twitter of awaking birds as they heard the songster of heaven proclaim that a new day had commenced.

"The night is over, Jack," said Dick, who wanted to get him into conversation if he possibly could. "You see that there is still much beauty and much gladness left in the great earth."

Jack raised his arm before him, and then turning to Dick, he said—

"Yes, there is beauty and there is gladness for all, save me! It is he alone who, with a capacity for suffering beyond that possessed by another creature, may look upon such a scene as this and feel no gladness."

"For a time, Jack, I admit. But there is no balm to a wounded spirit like nature and time."

"Dick, I am going to say something that, I am afraid, you will think unkind. Will you forgive me?"

"Oh, yes, since you ask it; because I feel quite sure that it is not intended as an unkindness. What is it, Jack?"

"We must part, Dick."

The manner in which Jack uttered those words were such that if he had spoken for a month about the subject, Dick Turpin could not have felt more thoroughly convinced than he at once did that Jack meant what he said.

The silence that ensued between them was somewhat embarrassing; but, at length, rather from feeling that he ought to say something than from any idea connected with what he said, Dick said—

"Do I understand you rightly, Jack? Did you say, part?"

"I did, Dick."

"And you mean it?"

"As Heaven is my judge, I do!"

There was another rather long silence now; and then, as Dick patted the neck of his steed, he said—

"God forbid that I should say anything to keep a man in my company who prefers being out of it. I don't suppose you have said such a thing as this, Jack, without giving it some sort of consideration. It would be quite an insult to you to suppose you had, old fellow; so, of course, if you have made up your mind to it, why, there's an end."

"As I suspected," said Jack.

"As what?"

"As I suspected: you are hurt about this affair."

"Hurt? Oh, no!"

"Yes, Dick, you are; but I expected you would be, only I preferred coming out at once with the fact, and then telling you why I had so made up my mind, to going a more roundabout way in the matter, and leading you to that conviction. Now, Dick, I will tell you why I think of leaving you."

"Well, Jack, go on."

"My heart is in the grave with poor Claude; and—and——"

Jack paused, and his head drooped upon his breast—he thought he had more strength than nature had given to him. The pronunciation of the name of Claude had completely, for the moment, unnerved him; and he was unable to proceed in what he had meant to say.

Hot, scalding tears gushed from his eyes, and trickled down his cheeks; and his bosom heaved with emotion.

Dick, to tell the truth, was himself too much affected at this paroxysm of grief upon the part of Jack to say anything of a comforting character to him for some seconds; but when he did speak, it was as well to induce him to retract his resolution to separate from him, Dick, as to try to assuage the agony of regret that was at his heart for the death of Claude.

"Jack, my dear fellow," he said, "let me tell you one thing, and that is, that you are coming to too hasty a decision. When the mind is full of any great passion—such as grief for the departed, or the like in magnitude—the judgment is far, very far, indeed, from free to act; and, therefore, you should be specially cautious of coming to any conclusion as to what you will do, or what you will not do, under such circumstances."

"Yes—yes, I know."

"You comprehend me, Jack?"

"Fully. The weakness of the moment is over, and I am able now, Dick, to tell you more calmly, that I have something to do, which will take me from you at once and for ever."

"Something to do?"

"Yes—yes, but I cannot tell you."

"I can hardly think, Jack, that you can have any work in this world now to perfom that a friend might not help you in."

"You are wrong. Oh, do not ask me! Dick, will you leave upon my mind the gratification that we parted quite good friends, without a shade of ill feeling—without any dim consciousness of offence upon your side? May I take with me that thought?"

"You may, Jack."

"With all your heart do you say so?"

"With all my heart Jack."

"Give me your hand, Dick."

Dick stretched out his hand to Jack, who grasped it firmly, and looking Dick in the face, he then said—

"I think I have said quite enough, and that it is better now that we say good-by to each other as we are, than enter further into a subject that must be painful to both of us."

"But, Jack, you half promised me an explanation of the reason why you are forced to leave me."

"I did, but I cannot now say more. Look there, Dick."

"Where?"

"To the west."

"Yes—well, I see. What of it?"

"There is where I am going. I shall keep that way, Dick; and when the early sun overtakes me, and throws his later beams into my face, I shall still follow it. When the night comes, I shall lie down to rest, till I can see my way again by the first faint beams of the morning. Yes, Dick, I have a mission to the west."

"Well, but, Jack?"

"Say on—I attend you."

"Come, now, my good friend, this is not kind to me. It is not kind to the memory of him whose grave we have stood by the side of. I ask of you but to stay this one day with me, and then if at this hour to-morrow morning you still have this strange determination to depart, I will no longer oppose it."

Jack shook his head.

"No—no, Dick," he said. "How sorry I am that you have asked me this much, because I cannot do it. At once, now, and for ever—farewell!"

"But why say for ever?"

"Because we shall not meet again."

"Oh, yes, we shall, Jack. Farewell, if the word must be uttered, for a little time; and when you wish to find me you know twenty places where you can go and inquire for me. The time will come when you will wish to sit down by the side of one who can speak to you of Claude Duval."

Jack held up his hand as if he would beg Dick to be silent, but Dick went on.

"In that time your feelings will be cooled down to a more sober state; and although neither you nor I, who knew him so well, can ever cease to feel regret for the death of our old friend, yet time will do much towards softening down that feeling to something of the tenderness of regret, without any of its wild and passionate feelings. Then, Jack, you will seek me."

"I will, if that time should come; but it will not. Farewell, Dick—farewell!"

Jack gave his horse an impulse forward, such as the creature was but little accustomed to, and after a plunge it darted off like the wind. By a dexterous movement of the bridle the creature was turned to the right, and a hedge and ditch together were cleared in gallant style. Another minute, and Jack and his steed plunged into a little copse in the meadows, and Dick was truly alone.

"Gone," said Dick—"gone! Claude Duval and Jack left me. I am alone now in the world! How still and sad the feeling is. No, I am not quite alone while you live, my gallant Bess—you who have borne me scathless through so many trials!"

The creature arched its neck and made a grateful snort as Dick patted it upon its silken mane.

"Hark! for the road!" cried Dick Turpin. "I must conquer reflection in the excitement of a life that is still open to me. Come, Bess, you and I are now all the world to each other, for there is an end of GENTLEMAN JACK."

In thus concluding the life of one of the most celebrated highwaymen that ever lived in this country, we may say, that one of the great sources of amusement which the contemplation of the career of such a man as Claude Duval affords to the reader must be looked for in the fact, that never again can the same circumstances that afforded facilities for highway robberies exist in England.

The railway train has put an end at once, and for ever, of the old class Knight of the Road; and we may truly say that the first sound of the first railway whistle was the knell of the old-fashioned mounted highwayman.

Dick Turpin and Gentleman Jack, and their friend, Sixteen-string Jack, might stop the York mail, but not the York train; and we may truly say—

"The highwayman's occupation's gone," and "we shall never look upon his like again."

THE END.
